Mr. WRIGHT observed that his purpose in rising was principally to remove from the honorable Senator from Virginia the embarrassment in which he was placed by this incidental discussion. We seem, said Mr. W. to be passing into what may become a protracted incidental debate; and having had his speech, on repeated occasions, suspended in the same way that the gentleman's now was, he would not himself prolong the discussion. He had, however, one word to say in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, and he would not say that word if it was not a personal affair to himself, and necessary to give a refutation to the unfounded report which had found its way into some of the newspapers, of some remarks of his in reference to his colleague. He was obliged, therefore, to the Senator from Kentucky for bringing this report before him; for, as it was not his habit to enter into conflict with the editors of newspapers, he had not before an opportunity of giving the report a public refutation. He would now, therefore, say that the whole story was entirely false from beginning to end. If he had ever done his colleague, personally or politically, any unkind act, it was wholly unintentional and without his knowledge. He knew that it had been reported, and he believed he had seen the report, that, on his passage home from this place in October last, he drew up resolutions to instruct his colleague; but he took the occasion to say that the whole matter was absolutely false. He now asked the Senate to pass over the question before them, in order to allow the Senator from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) an opportunity of going on with his argument on the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. PRESTON moved to lay the subject under discussion on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN was agreed to the motion with regard to the position of the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) but, as he always endeavored to pay his debts promptly, he had rather do so now.

The question was then taken on Mr. PRESTON's motion, and it was carried.

The Independent Treasury bill was then taken up; when

Mr. RIVES resumed his speech begun yesterday, and concluded, after occupying the floor till near 4 o'clock.

Mr. HUBBARD intimated his intention to address the Senate on the subject, and submitted an amendment to amend the text of the bill providing that all payments to be made from the Treasury Department, shall be by the drafts of the Treasurer of the United States, upon warrants drawn on him, (according to the present usage of the Department,) and further fixing the rate of compensation to be paid to the clerks provided for in the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, the gentleman from New Hampshire has intimated his intention to address the Senate on this subject to-morrow, and has brought forward an amendment. There is a point in regard to this bill, which has attracted my attention very particularly, and I wish now to mention it, that his attention may be drawn that way.

I was very much struck, on reading the first section of the bill, at the extraordinary display of skill manifested by those financiers who are to lead the country by this measure out of all its difficulties. The Senator from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in the course of the address with which he favored the Senate, stated the remarkable fact that, from the origin of the Government to the present time, there had been no designation of a Treasury of the United States, that is, of no particular buildings, rooms, or vaults, which were necessary to constitute a Treasury; and that in this bill this defect was remedied by providing that certain rooms in the new building, now in a course of erection in this city, are to be declared by law to be the Treasury of the United States.

I had supposed (continued Mr. C.) that the Treasury of these United States and the treasure were identical; and that wherever was the treasure, whether in custom-houses, in banks, or any where else, there also was the Treasury. If, for example, a part of the public money was in the hands of the Barings of London, or the Hopes of Amsterdam, it would be still in the Treasury, just as much as if it were in vaults in the city of Washington. But it seems the Senator from New York has made another discovery, in addition to the necessity for rooms, vaults, strong boxes, safes, or old cupboards, in which to keep secure the public money; and that is, that it is also necessary that there should be some particular place to be regarded as the Treasury.

I draw the attention of the Senate to this, that they may see what results must follow. The Constitution has provided that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in pursuance of previous appropriations made by law, and whatever is in the Treasury, in the meaning of the Constitution, cannot be drawn from it except by process of law under the Constitution. But (said Mr. C.) for whatever is without the Treasury, there is no constitutional provision; they may draw it out at their discretion, and send it any where, or dispose of it as they please.

And what farther is there? All the money which will be placed in the Treasury provided by this bill will be the little that will be collected or scraped together in this District of ten miles square; and this, of consequence, will be the whole amount which will be subject to the constitutional provision to which I have referred. All that is in New York, where a moiety of the public revenue is collected—all that is in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, constituting nearly the whole of the actual treasure of the United States, is excluded from the Treasury by the bill, and according to the Senator from New York, will be all placed without the power of the law and the Constitution, and may be disposed of by the Secretary and Treasurer as they may think proper. I saw this (said Mr. C.) as soon as I read it, and numerous other things alike objectionable, which I will not notice now. But that the Treasury is to be limited to the ten miles square, and to the miserable gleanings to be found in this District, can there be any thing more preposterous?

There were other defects in the bill, and other amendments had been offered, but I did not care about voting upon them. On the stock-jobbing section, for instance, (said Mr. C.) which the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) moved to strike out, I did not vote on that; and why? The whole measure is so hideous, so monstrous, that it is incapable of being placed in any form that would command my approbation; and I could not think it proper in any shape whatever.

But I had another reason (said Mr. C.) for taking no part in the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to strike out that section. The Senator from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) opposed the motion; the Chancellor of the Exchequer differed from the new Premier of the Administration on this point, and I wanted to see how the party would vote; I wished to see how the household troops would move; which they would follow; the Chancellor or the Premier. Sir, the Chancellor was left in a minority, and, according to the usage of the Governmen from which we derive much of our political system, and our customs, the Chancellor ought immediately to have thrown up the seals.

The amendments of Mr. HUBBARD being agreed to—

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business—

After which, it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1838.

Mr. BYNUM was announced as having been appointed to fill the vacancy of Mr. CLAIBORNE on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Select Committee on the subject of purchasing Gilbert Stewart's original portraits of the first five Presidents of the United States.

Messrs. CUSHING, of Massachusetts.
RICHARDSON, of South Carolina.
GARLAND, of Louisiana.
HUNTER, of Virginia.
HOFFMAN, of New York.

Reports from committees were then called for.

CLAIMS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee reported a bill for the relief of Abel A. Parks and others.

COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH reported a supplement to the report on the number, compensation and duties of custom-house officers, and also a resolution that 2000 extra copies of the whole report, documents, and bill on the same subject be printed, which was concurred in.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. EWING reported a bill granting a pension to Martha Strong.

When the Committee on the Expenditures of the Post Office Department was called upon,

Mr. WISE begged to inquire of the chairman of that committee, (Mr. CHILDS, of New York,) whether that committee had had any meeting, or proposed to do so, or contemplated making any report at all, or if they had discharged any of the duties belonging to them, this session?

Mr. CHILDS not being in his seat, no response was given to Mr. WISE's inquiry.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HARLAN reported Senate bill entitled "An act to provide for the legal adjudication and settlement of the claims to land of Baron Bastrop, Marquis de Baton Rouge, and others, in Louisiana, and sundry persons in Arkansas," with a recommendation that the same do not pass, and moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana moved its recommitment to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which, after a few words in support of the motion by Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to employ as many temporary clerks as shall be necessary to enable him to report, during the present session, the correspondence called for by a resolution of this House of the 12th day of October last, in relation to public defaulters.

Mr. G. gave as a reason for offering this resolution, the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had not sufficient force in the Department to comply with the call.

Mr. WISE begged the fact to be noted that the number of the public defaulters was so great that it is necessary to adopt this resolution to make out a list of them.

Mr. McKAY presumed when the gentleman got the information, it would not present such a formidable list of defaulters as he contemplated.

Mr. McK. was not opposed to the object of this resolution, but he objected to its form, since under it the Secretary of the Treasury might appoint as many clerks as he pleased, without authority of law; and if this were once conceded, it might be augmented to any amount. It was violative, in its present form, of every principle of constitutional law.

Mr WISE suggested that, in order to render the resolution unexceptionable to his friend from North Carolina, it be made in the form of a joint resolution.

Mr. McKAY added that the list of defaulters was already complete, and the object of his friend from Virginia (Mr. GARLAND) was to procure the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and receivers and collectors.

Mr. GARLAND nodded his assent.

Mr. WISE understood the resolution of the late special session, calling for the number of defaulters, he did not remember its exact terms, had not been complied with, and that the head of the Treasury Department wanted additional force to enable him to answer it.

Mr. GARLAND would say nothing about what the document would, or would not, disclose. Of that he should be prepared to speak when the disclosures were made, and he now asked nothing or sought nothing but what every member of the House might desire, and that was, to ascertain what was the true state of the mode of collecting and disbursing the public money by the agents of the Government. The resolution, in addition to the response already furnished to the House, called for the correspondence of the three years of '35, '6, and '37, and the Secretary had reported a list of the defaulters, the amount of their defalcations, and the steps taken to recover them, but the Solicitor of the Treasury said he could not comply with the latter part of the resolution, because the correspondence was so extensive, and his force inadequate.

Mr. G. stated that he did want to show one fact, viz: that there had been more loss, and more embarrassment from conducting the public finances through individual agency than through the State banks.

Mr. G. then modified his resolution, by adopting it to the form of a joint resolution, and it was read twice, the question being on its third reading.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he did not rise to oppose the resolution, for, on the other hand, he should give it his most cordial support; but on this investigation about public defalcations, he would call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, and the members of the House on all sides, to the document already published in pursuance of his resolution.

A more complete libel upon dead men never was published by order of Congress. For one, he was not altogether sorry that this document had been published, because they had been in the habit of publishing without examination, and it might make them more cautious in future. Let any gentleman peruse this report, and he would find a record in it of every defaulter from the origin of the Government to the present time, not one half of whom were defaulters, and a large proportion of whom were in their graves. Upon the adjustment, too, of most of those accounts at the Treasury, those balances of a hundred and two hundred thousand dollars had not only been, in a majority of cases, reduced to nothing, but, upon a final settlement, it was found that the Government itself was in debt. And yet the House had sent five thousand copies of this libel abroad to the world, impugning the characters of dead men of the highest respectability, who never owed the Government a dollar.

In proof of this, Mr. C. adduced the instance of the district attorney at Philadelphia, (Mr. Ingersool,) who was represented to be a defaulter for upwards of $75,000, when the fact was, that on the final decision of the court, only $3,000 was found to be due by him, and he had vouchers in his possession, ruled out by the court, because not previously presented to the Treasury, for $7,000, thereby making him a creditor, instead of a debtor to the Government. This great balance had appeared against him from the practice of the Government in charging the district attorneys with the bonds, whether they were paid or not.

The same erroneous impression, too, had been been made in reference to a late collector at New York. Upwards of $55,000 was charged against him, whereas he did not owe a solitary dollar, so far as Mr. C. knew; and this balance was still standing, after twenty years. He had cited these two facts to gentlemen on all sides, that they would not, in the pursuit of one object, inflict a stab through the ribs of men as honest as ever lived, and that the public might be aware of the nature of the document.

Mr. GARLAND knew not a single individual when he moved his resolution, but there would enough be shown to prove the system of individual agency a bad one.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. Not more so than under the Bank of the United States, or the gentleman's own system.

Mr. GRAVES had some objection, on the ground of the expense, for the printing would probably cover some five or six thousand pages.

After some further remarks from Messrs. REED, McKENNAN, CAMRRELENG, SMITH, and E. WHITTLESEY, the House, without taking the question, passed to the orders of the day.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

A Message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, esq. communicating a report of the causes which have delayed the sailing of the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to lay the Message and documents on the table, and that they be printed.

Mr. FILLMORE moved the printing of 10,000 extra copies; but it was objected to.

Mr. MALLORY moved their reference to a select committee.

Mr. HAYNES moved the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion to lay on the table prevailed.

Mr. WISE gave notice that, as soon as it was in order to do so, he should move to take this subject from the table, in order that it might be duly investigated.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

In pursuance of the notice given on yesterday by Mr. EVANS, as stated in the proceedings of that day, the House took up the message from the President of the United States on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, etc.

Mr. EVANS said that before he proceeded he should ask leave to introduce a bill—

The CHAIR said it was not now in order to do this.

Mr. EVANS said he had stated at an early part of this session, that he would ask leave to bring in a bill on this subject. If it was not now in order to do so by the rule, he should ask the general consent of the House to do so; and if leave was not granted, he would then move to refer the subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instruction to report the bill he referred to. He now asked the general consent of the House to submit a motion for leave to introduce a bill.

Objection being made,

Mr. EVANS then moved to refer the message of the President to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report the following bill:

A BILL to provide for surveying the northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States cause the boundary line between the United States and the adjacent British provinces from the source of the St. Croix river, directly north to the highlands which divide the waters that fall into the Atlantic ocean, from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence, thence along said highlands from the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river, as particularly defined in the treaty of peace, concluded at Paris, the third day of September, seventeen hundred and eighty-three, to be accurately surveyed and marked, and suitable monuments to be erected thereon, at such points as may be deemed necessary and important.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That for th purposes aforesaid, the President be, and is hereby authorized, if in his judgment it shall be necessary, in addition to the services of the corps of Topographical Engineers, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one commissioner and one surveyor, who shall perform such duties respectively as may be assigned to them by the President, and who may employ such assistants under the direction of the President, as shall be necessary, and who shall make an exact return of their proceedings to the President, together with a correct map of the country over which said line passes, exhibiting the prominent points of its topography, and the location of the works and monuments by them made and erected.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of said commissioner and surveyor shall be respectively at the rate of ——— dollars per annum.

Mr. EVANS begged leave to assure the House that it was not his disposition to take up the time of the House in a discussion of this matter, if his duty would permit him to do so. He should, however, consider that he would be wanting in the duty he owed to the State of Maine, if he neglected to take the first opportunity which presented itself of bringing this important subject to the consideration of the National Legislature. He would now say that he had most sedulously sought an opportunity of bringing this matter to the consideration of the House. He was the more anxious to bring the matter to the consideration of the House, because the subject had never been discussed, and was but little understood in this House, or in the other branch of the National Legislature, and because it was a question of the most deep and abiding interest to the States of Maine and Massachusetts. It had been alluded to in the Message of the President of the United States as an important subject, and it was considered by him in his Message as a matter of great surprise that this Government had been organized for half a century, and yet does not know its own limits. Now, he wished to bring to the notice of the House a proposition for the purpose of accelerating the movements of the General Government towards a settlement of the question. The object of the bill he had brought to the notice of the House was to take one step, on the part of our Government, towards a final settlement of this question to the satisfaction of all parties. He desired the legislative power of the country to come to the aid of the Executive in relation to this matter, and the object he had in view by the bill was to bring the two Houses of Congress to sustain and aid the Executive in the settlement of this question. He begged leave here to say that this measure was not a measure of his alone, but it was a measure of the people and State of Maine. It was not a measure required by him alone, but it was required and called for by the Legislature of the State of Maine. It was called for by resolutions of that Legislature, now lying upon the tables of members, and these resolutions ask the General Government to do the identical thing proposed by the bill he had introduced. It had also been urged upon the General Government by the Governor of the State of Maine. He must say, in relation to this matter, that he had cause to complain of the neglect of the General Government towards the State of Maine. He had to make complaint of the General Government in not protecting the citizens of the State of Maine from wrongs committed against them by a foreign Government.

In making there complaints, he made them in the name of the State of Maine, for he had been long enough here to learn that when complaints of this kind were made, they were generally set down to some political hostility to the Administration. This matter, however, was not a political matter, as all branches of the Government of the State of Maine, made these complaints. A Democratic Governor, a Democratic Legislature, and Democratic public journals had made these complaints; and this showed that it was no political question, as all parties concurred in relation to the matter. He trusted, therefore, that these complaints would not be looked upon as being caused by political feeling.

Mr. E. then went into a very lengthy detail with respect to the northeastern boundary line, and the correspondence between the two Governments in relation to the same, for the purpose of showing that the boundary claimed by the Government of the United States was the true boundary.

Before Mr. E. had concluded, he gave way to Mr. LINCOLN, for a motion to adjourn, who, however withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, on whose motion the bill from the Senate "to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, in which the late Bank of the United States has been a party," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Judiciary

The Senate bill to establish a new collection district in the State of Mississippi, at Vicksburg, was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, committed to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and by the general consent of the House, the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1838, was put upon its third reading; and, after some explanatory remarks between Messrs. BELL, CAMBRELENG, CURTIS, WISE, and HAYNES,

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1838.

The VICE-PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, in obedience to a resolution of the 26th ult. containing the number of hostile Creek Indians, as estimated by the commanding general, and from data in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Also, from the same Department, a report in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th inst. containing surveys of Milwaukie and other rivers in Wisconsin Territory.

These were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following petitions and memorials were presented and referred:

By Mr. McKEAN: A memorial of the delegates now assembled at Philadelphia to alter the State Constitution, praying Congress to adopt measures to improve the Alleghany river from Pittsburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, to Olean Point, in the State of New York: ordered to be printed.

By Mr. MOUTON: From the collector at Franklin, Louisiana, praying the erection of certain lighthouses and certain improvements in navigation.

By Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky: From citizens of Philadelphia, praying the completion of the United States frigate Raritan. [Mr. C. expressed the hope that the Committee on Naval Affairs would act speedily on this subject, and report one way or the other. The winter was rapidly passing off, and if any thing should be done, the earlier the better.]

By Messrs. NICHOLAS, LINN, and BUCHANAN, on individual claims.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to abolish the United States Circuit Court at Huntsville, Mississippi, and for other purposes: read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, a call was ordered on the Secretary of the Treasury for statements as to the amount of revenue lost to the Government in consequence of the non-payment of duty bonds on imported articles, in 1837–8, with the names of the delinquents.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, a call was ordered on the Secretary of War, and inquiries in relation to a certain report on the boundary line, &c. of Arkansas.

OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. LINN, of Missouri, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the occupation of the Columbia or Oregon river, [establishing a Territory north of latitude 42 degrees, and west of the Rocky Mountains, to be called the Oregon Territory; authorizing the establishment of a fort on that river, and the occupation of the country by the military force of the United States; establishing a port of entry, and requiring that the country should then be held subject to the revenue laws of the United States; with an appropriation of $50,000.]

The bill having been read twice, Mr. LINN moved to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs. He expressed his regret that some other Senator had not moved in this matter; he had failed in his endeavors to that effect, and had in consequence now presented the subject himself as one of great importance. There was reason to apprehend that if this Territory should be neglected, in the course of five years it would pass from our possession.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he thought the Senator and the committee would do well to make inquiries as to the stipulations of the present treaty with Great Britain, and whether we could occupy this country now without giving cause of offence. The country had been taken possession of by Great Britain, in contravention of the treaty of Ghent. There was a clause in that treaty, or rather a word, which was intended to cover this identical case, connected with the Oregon, and which covered no other case. It was founded on these circumstances: A settlement had been made on the Oregon by Mr. Astor, and the establishment was called Astoria. During the war it was taken possession of by a British armed vessel. In the stipulation of the mutual surrender by the two countries of places taken during the war, Mr. C. had introduced the word "possession" as descriptive of the hold which we had on the Oregon country prior to the war. Mr. C. hoped the treaty would be examined before any decisive step should be taken on this subject.

Mr. LINN said he was aware of that provision, and it was his intention that the inquiry should be made. He designed to get all the information he could on the subject, and lay it before the committee or the Senate, that the Senate might make such modifications of the bill as they might think proper. He wished the bill to be made as perfect as it could be.

Mr. LYON remarked that he knew of one of his constituents being desirous of going west of the Rocky Mountains for the purpose of settling and carrying on a farm.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he was very glad that his friend from Missouri had moved in this business; and he had done himself injustice when he said it might have been moved more appropriately by another person. The time had come when we ought to assert our right to the Oregon country, or abandon it forever. We know, by information received from an agent of the Government, that the Hudson Bay Company were establishing forts in that quarter, cutting down the timber and conveying it to market, and acquiring the allegiance of the Indian tribes; and while they had been thus proceeding, we had patiently looked on during a long period of years. Our right ought to be now asserted; but it should be done in a prudent and delicate manner. We were obliged by the treaty to give a year's notice. The time had arrived to settle this question, and there were too many such questions unsettled with the British Government already. While we should be careful to violate no treaty stipulations, we ought promptly to assert our right to this country.

Mr. BENTON urged the propriety of having this subject referred to a select committee, of which his colleague should be the chairman: he knew of no one better qualified.

Mr. LINN, after some demurring, assented, withdrew his motion of reference to the Military Committee, and the subject was referred to a select committee of five, of which the VICE PRESIDENT was authorized to make the appointment.

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, the resolution offered by him, authorizing the Joint Library Committee to cause the Madison papers to be printed and published, was taken up, changed to the form of a joint resolution of both Houses, on the suggestion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, read twice, and, after some conversation, it was referred, on motion of Mr. SEVIER, to the Committee on the Library.

The bill to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, to which the late United States Bank is a party, and

The bill to establish a new collection district in Mississippi, at Vicksburg,

Were severally read a third time, and passed.

The resolution for an inquiry as to placing the staff officers of the Revolution on the same footing, as to grants of land, with the officers of the line, was taken up, and agreed to.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties as depositaries on public officers in certain cases, etc.—the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute for the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD spoke at large on the subject, in favor of the bill, and in reply to Mr. RIVES; and, before he concluded, he gave way for a motion of adjournment, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 8, 1838.

Reports from committees were called for.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Connecticut reported the following, viz:

Bill for the relief of Eleanor Clark.

Bill for the relief of Marcy Richards.

Bill for the relief of Francis Chandler.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. ROBERTSON reported, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled "an act to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, to which the late Bank of the United States may be party."

The amendment was in the follwing words: "or which may be pending on the 4th day of March next."

Mr. R. moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the attention of the committee had been drawn to the fact, how far it was competent to commence suits after the 4th of March next.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied that that question had been presented to, and discussed in the committee, but they had refused to amend it further for fear of jeopardising the speedy passage of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a wish that an additional section to that effect be engrafted on the bill, for as it stood, it led to the impression that all suits commenced against the Bank of the United States, and not terminated on the 3d of March next would be, ipso facto, abated, and the bank thereby relieved from all responsibility of redeeming the reissue of the old bills, after the two years allowed to wind up its affairs from the expiration of the charter.

Mr. ROBERTSON said it was not understood by the committee to be the intention or effect of this bill to decide that suits pending on the 4th of March, by, or against the bank, would or would not abate. The bill had been prepared in the abundance of caution, and was considered a matter of such importance, as to require its immediate passage by the House, leaving the question of instituting suits against the bank, after the 4th of March, to be submitted at another time. He would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to suffer this bill to pass, and to introduce a resolution requiring the Committee on the Judiciary to take into consideration the subject of extending the time.

Mr. ADAMS explained his motive to be to secure the creditors of the bank, which, by implication, at least, appeared to be lost sight of by this bill. He desired to see some act of Congress putting it in the power of the creditors of the bank to recover their claims against it, and he thought it better to recommit the bill.

Mr. CILLEY stated that he had not had an opportunity of giving this bill that full examination its importance required, for the committee had been suddenly called together, on a day different from their ordinary days of meeting, and had come to a very hasty determination. Mr. C. addressed the House at some length, and concluded by expressing his accordance with the suggestion of Mr. ADAMS, to recommit the bill.

Mr. LOOMIS stated that he most heartily concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) in the object sought to be obtained by him—the security of the holders of the bills of the late Bank of the United States, issued by the present bank; but he doubted whether the object could be attained, as suggested by that gentleman, by an act authorizing suits at law to be commenced against the bank after the final expiration of the time to which its corporate existence had been limited to enable it to close its affairs, and which would take place on the 4th of March next. No suit could be instituted against a corporation after it had expired. It had a mere legal existence, and, by the expiration of its charter, it became defunct—there was no longer any thing to sue or be sued; but surely some remedy must be adopted to secure the holders of bills issued (he thought the circumstances would justify the expression) fraudulently issued by the present Bank of the United States, and which she was not liable to pay. Well might the bill-holders ask, who is liable to pay these bills? He had, within a few days past, received a letter from one of his constituents—a highly respectable citizen—stating that there had been recently paid out in that vicinity $40,000 of the bills of the old Bank of the United States for the produce of the country, and stating that the people were getting alarmed in respect to them, and were anxious to know to whom they were to look to redeem them, and asking his opinion and advice as to whom the people were to look for their redemption. What answer could be made to such an inquiry? The only remedy he could conceive, was for some person or corporation who had, by purchase or otherwise, acquired a sufficient amount to warrant the expense, to institute proceedings in chancery in the United States courts, to have a receiver appointed, to reduce the assets of the old bank into money, and pay off its liabilities. He was certainly not disposed to continue the existence of the charter of that bank, which he had shown would be necessary in order to make it subject to actions at law. As he understood the matter, the funds and property of old bank were now in possession of the new bank or its officers, in the character of trustees, to close up its concerns, and collect its funds, and pay off its liabilities. Instead of faithfully discharging this trust, and getting in its circulation, they had been engaged in extending it; instead of paying off its notes, for which purpose they took the funds, they were issuing old notes. They had done so to the amount of several millions. Surely this state of things ought not to be suffered. This Government have created the corporation, and given it all its power; and it seemed to him it was bound to take all necessary measures to prevent the abuse of this power, and to protect their citizens from frauds and losses.

He had thought of introducing a resolution, either directing, in the first instance, or directing an inquiry into the expediency of passing a law, requiring the Attorney General of the United States to institute proceedings for the appointment of a receiver of the funds and property of the late bank, and paying off its liabilities, and closing the concern. The present trustees had not proved faithful to their trust, and ought to be removed. In a short time the funds and property of the late bank would be so changed, that they could not be identified. As yet it was probable that a sufficient amount to pay off its liabilities might be traced and identified; but if the present trustees were continued, they would soon be so amalgamated with the funds of the present bank as not to be distinguished. If there was any thing in the charter to prevent the application of this course before the 4th of March, a law might be made prospective, to take effect at that time. He preferred that this whole subject should come up together; it was all connected, and immediate action on this part of it seemed to him very important. He was, therefore, in favor of recommitting the report to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia explained that this bill had come from the Senate on yesterday, and that it was simply a bill to prevent the abatement of suits now depending, and which may be brought against the institution, or by it, prior to the 4th of March next. He was opposed to the connection of the matter brought to the notice of the House with this bill, because it was necessary that it should be passed immediately, as the 4th of March was near at hand, and if this matter was connected with it, he feared it would elicit not only a lengthy discussion in relation to the propriety of the measure, but that it would introduce a political bank discussion, which, in all probability, would not be brought to a close by the 4th of March. The whole bank question, he anticipated, would be opened up by it, and all the alleged abuses of the bank would be again brought to view. He would here state, that he had no friendly disposition towards the Bank of the United States, notwithstanding that he had been charged with being friendly to it from a certain quarter in this city. This bill was of the utmost importance, inasmuch as there was no provision in relation to the continuance of suits in the charter after the 4th of March next. He trusted, therefore, that the bill would pass the House, and then if there was any thing further necessary, let a new bill be introduced to that effect.

Mr. TOUCEY hoped the bill would be recommitted to the committee, so that it might be considered at a full meeting of the committee, because this morning there had only been five members of the committee present, the other four not having a knowledge of the meeting of the committe or of the character of the bill. He, therefore, trusted that the motion to recommit would prevail.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was notified to attend a meeting of the Judiciary Committee, for the purpose of taking up and considering a bill of great importance. He attended, and found five members of the committee in attendance. The whole of the members present concurred in the importance of the bill, and in reporting it to the House with the amendments which had been presented. It was true the gentleman from Maine had raised some objections, but he subsequently waived the objections, and agreed that the bill should be reported to the House.

Mr. CILLEY explained that he had agreed it should, in case it was shown to the absent members of the committee before it was reported to the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he was desirous that it should have been submitted to the absent members, and for this purpose he had waited until after the Committee on the Judiciary had been called by the Chair; and no opportunity presented itself, as the gentlemen were not to be found by him. As to the remark of the gentleman, that he did not know any of the provisions of the bill, he thought it strange, because he thought that every member of the House was aware that this bill was to prevent the abatement of suits brought by and against the Bank of the United States. He hoped the bill would be speedily adopted by the House.

Mr. BOND said that this bill was not a measure proposed for the benefit of the Bank of the United States, but it was a measure for the benefit of the people of this country. The people of this country were larger creditors of the bank than debtors to it; therefore, it was a measure for the benefit of the people. The bank had sold out her branches in the different States to individuals and State banks, and in many cases suits were depending both by and against the bank to the amount of several millions; therefore, it was highly proper that this bill should be passed, so that these suits might not be abated.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that he was in favor of the passage of this bill; but he should like to have it go back to the committee, so that it might be acted upon at a full meeting of the committee. As the majority of the committee had already reported it to the House, he had no doubt it would immediately be reported by the committee after being considered in a full committee. This would satisfy the House; and he trusted this course would be pursued.

Mr. EVANS called for the orders of the day; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. TURNEY said that this bill had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary late last evening, on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARLAND.) A partial meeting of the committee was held this morning, although this was not the usual time for the meeting of the committee, and without the usual notice being given. The subject was considered, and it was true that a majority of the committee agreed to report the bill to the House, still he thought it ought to have been considered at a full meeting of the committee.

Mr. GARLAND stated that it was true that he had on yesterday moved to have this bill committed to the Committee on the Judiciary; and from that fact, and the remarks of the gentleman this morning, it might be supposed that he had called the committee together. He begged leave, however, now to say that he had not made that call.

Mr. TURNEY said it was not his intention to cast any reflection upon any member of the committee. He had merely stated the facts of the case, and he hoped, considering those facts, that the House would see the propriety of sending the bill back to the committee.

Mr. ATHERTON concurred in the remarks of of the gentleman from Tennessee, and hoped that the House would send back this bill; because he would be very unwilling that it should be passed by the House, without having been fully considered at a full meeting of the committee.

The question was then taken, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a report on the subject of Telegraphs, lying on the Speaker's table, was taken up and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The first business in order was the motion of Mr. EVANS to refer a message of the President of the United States, with sundry accompanying documents, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report a bill to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783.

The objection made yesterday for leave to bring in this bill being withdrawn,

Mr. EVANS accordingly brought in the bill, moved its first and second reading, and reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. E. then resumed his remarks at the point left off yesterday, going into an extended review of the whole subject, referring to the correspondence and other documents bearing upon it. Mr. E. concluded by moving also the printing of three thousand extra copies of the document referred to.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then took the floor, but gave way to Mr. CARTER of Maine, on whose motion, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 8, 1838.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a petition numerously signed by the business men of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying Congress to aid in the construction of the steamboat canal about to be constructed round the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side, by subscribing for stock in the Jeffersonville and New Albany canal company. Mr. S. also presented the charter of the company; which, together with the petition, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PIERCE presented certain documents in support of the petition of Joseph Bassett; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALL presented a petition numerously signed by citizens of Philadelphia, praying that an appropriation may be made for the completion of the frigate Raritan, now on the stocks: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to authorize the State of Mississippi to invest the two per cent. und of that State, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Whereas, the papers, documents, records, and archives, which are kept and deposited in the offices of the Recorder and Surveyor General of the United States respectively, at St. Louis, State of Missouri, are of the highest value and importance, and a great number of which, namely, those relating to French and Spanish land titles in the province of Upper Louisiana, if lost, purloined, or destroyed, could either not be replaced at all, or only replaced at great labor, expense, and inconvenience. And whereas, those records, which are exclusively of proceedings and surveys anterior to the treaty of cession of Louisiana to the United States, could not, if destroyed, be replaced without great labor, and an expenditure of at least a million of dollars; and whereas they are now in continual and imminent danger of being lost, stolen, or destroyed, in consequence of the very exposed and insecure state of the buildings in which these offices are now kept, at St. Louis; and whereas it is in the highest degree expedient and necessary to provide, without delay, for the safe-keeping of these all-important records and archives, it therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire and report whether any, and what, measures should be adopted by Congress to secure the papers, documents, records, and archives now deposited and kept in the offices of the Recorder and Surveyor General of the United States, respectively, at St. Louis, State of Missouri, from fire or other accidents; and what amount of money it would require to provide suitable iron safes or buildings at St. Louis, in which said offices might be held, and the above described papers, documents, records, and archives safely kept and deposited.

The bill to abolish the Circuit Court of the United States at Huntsville, Alabama, was read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties as depositaries on public officers in certain cases, etc.—the question being on Mr. RIVES's substitute for the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD then addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the substitute of Mr. RIVES, and in conclusion of his speech commenced yesterday.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he did not rise with the view of going into the merits of the bill; whatever he might have to say on that subject, he should reserve for the further progress of the debate. His object was to repel insinuations which had been thrown out from high authority, and endorsed by the Senator from New Hampshire, last up, in relation to the influence said to be exercised by the banks in the November elections in his State. Mr. T. maintained that if any improper influence had been exercised, that it was more on the side of the Administration than against it. The greatest change which had taken place in the public feeling was in those counties where banks were not located; and this change, which had so surprised the President, was no subject of astonishment to Mr. T. He had all along told them that if the contemplated measure was attempted to be carried through, that New York would speak for herself in a language not to be misunderstood. She had so spoken; and he warned the friends of the Administration against the ides of November, if they persisted in a scheme of such madness and folly.

Mr. T. contended that the change which had taken place in the popular sentiment was occasioned by the alarm in the minds of the better sort of the party, lest the views of English Radicals, Loco Focos, and others of that stamp, were to be forced upon the country. It was that fear that produced the change in New York and other places; the people thought they saw a fixed determination of those in power for the destruction of all banks, the repeal of charters and vested rights. He would not say that such was the design; but it was thought to be so, from the course pursued by the official organ of the Executive. After the war against the United States Bank was over, and the monster dead, and after the State banks had been used in part as agents in effecting that destruction, then came a warfare, more violent and unrelenting in its nature against the State banks, than had ever been waged against the Bank of the United States. Many who had enlisted in the first war were not disposed to serve through the second; they could not be brought to enlist in a crusade against the State institutions; and now that they had been deprived of the United States Bank, they began to appreciate its benefits.

The gentleman from New Hampshire had said there was no design to interfere with the institutions of the States. If that were so, what were the people to infer from their acts? Look to the bankrupt laws, as recommended by the Executive at the extra session. Whatever the President recommended, he must have presumed at least that it would have been acted on; and then what would have been the effect produced? Why that all the banking institutions throughout the whole country would be placed under the hands of commissioners, and they under the revision of the President, the result of which would have been, that all the great interests of the country, commercial and inland, would have been sacrificed. Had the President forgot that while a Senator from New York, in 1826, he had declared in this body that the bankrupt law was unconstitutional; and yet in this short period, he was the first to recommend a measure, which, if it could have been carried out, would have ended in one wide-sweeping destruction over all the moneyed institutions of the States.

Mr. T. said that another reason why the people had taken the alarm was, that every man who lifted his voice against these schemes was proscribed by the "official organ," as it was called. They saw their representatives denounced and vilified for the stand they had taken. They saw, too, the acts of the Executive, in recommending one measure, and then, when they were ready to carry it into effect, they were ordered to wheel about and march off. They had seen the Specie circular, with the feelings of both Houses of Congress against it, retained, to the great injury of the country. They saw, too, that this identical measure now before them, when introduced by a representative from Virginia some time since, was denounced as revolutionary in its bearing, as injudicious and unsafe, and that all the force that could be rallied in its favor did not amount to more than thirty-two votes. And yet, said Mr. T. this scheme is now presented by the Executive, and we are called on and expected to vote for it. He, as a party, took ground against it at that time, and he, as one of that party, was pressing the same principle he then pursued; and yet the opponents of this scheme were treated in a manner that showed that freedom of speech and thought was no longer cherished; that the very theory of government was reversed; and when Executive power had become such that all who opposed its views were to be proscribed and denounced, it was time for people to take the alarm; and he would tell gentlemen, if these means were persisted in, that New York would speak in November in a voice louder than the mighty cataract on her western border.

Mr. T. said that there was nothing to justify the allegation that the banks had exerted their influence; there was not the slightest foundation for such an assertion; yet what a picture did it present to the world of Republican institutions! What would be the opinion in England, with whom we had more intercourse than all others, when a Chief Magistrate charged upon a State, and that the Empire State, that her elective franchise had been corrupted through the influence of local banks.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he rose more because he supposed the Senate would expect him to reply, than because he was disposed to do so. The remarks of his colleague had been principally confined to questions belonging to the State which they had the honor to represent here, and its citizens, and not to questions involved in the discussion before this body.

It had been his object, and he believed his habit, to confine himself to the debate before the Senate, and he could not be induced now to vary from a rule which he had found so salutary. In the part he had taken in those debates, he had endeavored to discuss every topic with temper and moderation, and to respect the feelings and courtesy due to every member of the body, whatever opinions he might hold.

That, too, he intended to do now. And as it was certain that any discussion between himself and his colleague, upon questions which did not pertain to our duties here, which related to the action of their common constituents, and to the results of elections, and the like, would be almost certain to throw them into conflict, to develope a radical difference of opinions and views between them, and perhaps to excite personal feeling, he declined all such discussions wholly.

He had, as he had had occasion to say, upon a very recent occasion, intended to treat his honorable and respected colleague with every kindness, and he could not follow him into a debate which might place the full execution of that intention beyond his power.

They could yet both agree in one opinion: that they represented a people as intelligent, as free, as uncorrupted and incorruptible, as the constituency of any two Senators upon the floor. Whatever then might be their opinions of the causes which influenced a particular election, or to which its results were attributable, or whatever they might think of the influence of pending questions upon future elections, they could not claim that their opinions, or wishes, would materially influence that constituency. If they were free, and intelligent, and uncorrupted, this inference was not authorized.

The only question, then, which, as between themselves, they could properly debate was, in cases in which they were compelled to differ, which represented that constituency truly. This was a question which he could not discuss with his colleague here. It might be interesting to an audience, but it could not be useful to the country to hear them wrangle upon such a point.

He had not another single remark to make in reply to his colleague. He (Mr. TALLMADGE) had understood the late annual Message of the President to cast an imputation upon the independent electors of the State of New York, of corruption at the November election in that States. This was the first construction of that character which had been put upon that document in any quarter. He (Mr. W.) did not so understand it. The President referred to the fact that the election was exclusively for State, and not at all for Federal, officers. He also referred to the immense State, and local, and corporate, and private interests which must be presented to the State Legislature then to be elected, and ventured to infer that the action of the people at the polls might be supposed to have been influenced by these great considerations, and not by the questions of a national character then depending before the country, and which might come before the present Congress. This was his understanding of the sentiments of the Message; but the document was before the country, and was as well understood by the constituents of his colleague and himself as by them. A large portion of those constituents were as capable of placing a proper construction upon the language of the President as they were; and he must, therefore, decline any further discussion of that point with his colleague here.

He must say, however, that he felt the deepest consciousness, and he knew his colleague ought to feel the same, that the President was incapable of making a charge of corruption against the people of his native State; that he had not done it in fact, and certainly had not in intention.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, when he first rose, he remarked that he did not mean to go into the merits of the bill, but to repel the charge which he conceived to be made against the people of his State, and which he knew, from his own personal knowledge, to be without foundation. No man, he said, was less in the habit of wandering from the subject under discussion than himself; but when the people of his State were aspersed, he felt it his duty to defend them at all times and on all occasions.

Mr. CLAY said it was not his intention to enter into any argument at this time on the main question under discussion; but he had risen to express his thanks to the Senator from New York, who first addressed the Chair, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) for the notice he took of the President's Message. The Senator's colleague, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in declining to meet him on that ground, showed that he acknowledged the truth of the maxim that "discretion was the better part of valor." He was shocked (Mr. C. said) at the President having undertaken in his Message to comment on the result of the local elections. It was unprecedented, and, he must be allowed to say, undignified. It was the first example in which the President spoke of the elections, not of the General Government, but of the State Governments. He recollected when, some years ago, an illustrious man, now no more, who was the Chief Magistrate of the State of New York, called the attention of the Legislature to the interference of the Federal officers with the State elections. A resolution was adopted, asking him to give evidence of the facts charged by him, which, from the nature of the circumstances, it was not in his power to give; but had the facts been established, the whole country would have sympathised with him and expressed the deepest abhorrence at the conduct of which he complained. A State Chief Magistrate might, in his message, refer to the result of his elections in his own State, but what decent pretext had a President of the United States to take notice of the result of State elections, and assign causes, dishonorable causes, for them. The Senator from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) said that he would not occupy the attention of the Senate with subjects foreign to that under discussion. If it was improper for the Senator to do it, how came the President to do it, and assign dishonorable causes for the result? for no man could read the Message without seeing that there was a direct insinuation of bank influence. Sir, said Mr. C. if the President had ventured to take such notice of the elections in my State, not one day, not one hour, should have passed, without my offering a resolution, notwithstanding the expunging resolution stands on the record, severely reprehending such conduct. He did hope that one of the Senators from New York or Pennsylvania would have risen and vindicated his State against the unfounded and unworthy imputations contained in that Message. He agreed with the Senator from New York who had first spoken, (Mr. TALLMADGE) that the result of the New York elections was owing to the conduct of the last and the present Administration. If ever there was an instance of a great people moved by a sense of danger to preserve their interests against a course of measures utterly destructive of them; if ever there was a spontaneous movement of a people, unprompted by the usual appliances which attend elections, to assert their rights against the madness, wickedness, and folly of an Administration, it was that of the New York election. He thanked the Senator from New York (Mr. TALLMADGE) for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. It was known to his friends that he was ready with a resolution calling on the Chief Magistrate for the evidence on which he made his allusions to the New York elections, but refrained from offering it, merely because the matter did not relate to his own State.

Mr. WRIGHT said the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) was over kind to his colleague; that if a controversy must arise between him and his colleague here, he (Mr. W.) should have more than he could well attend to, to meet upon equal terms his colleague alone, without the weight of the distinguished Senator in the scale against him. It was, therefore, wholly unnecessary that the patriotic gentleman should have interposed himself as a shield to his colleague upon the present occasion.

He could not, however, forbear one remark in reply to the Senator himself. That distinguished and experienced statesman had told him that, in declining the controversy with his colleague, he had illustrated the maxim that "discretion is the better part of valor." This was a sound maxim, and he (Mr. W.) had intended, in all his actions here, to bear it constantly in mind. Since hearing the views of the Senator upon that part of the message of the President to which his honorable colleague had alluded, and his declaration as to the resolution in censure of the President, which he says he was inclined and prepared to offer, but which he finally omitted to present, he must say that, upon one single occasion, the gentleman had consulted the rule which he had so promptly complimented him for following. In this case, discretion was, most clearly, the better part of valor in his action.

Mr. CLAY, (good humoredly) All pretty fair, very fair, sir.

After the consideration of Executive business, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, February 9, 1838.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Hon. H. A. MUHLENBERG, notifying that he had this day forwarded his resignation, as a member of the House, to the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WISE rose and said, that in coming to the House this morning, he had met the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MUHLENBERG,) and he must say, when he saw that gentleman departing, that he felt some personal regret at his taking his leave of us. I (said Mr. W.) have known that gentleman ever since I have been in public life; and permit me to say, although a political opponent, that he goes from this body with my personal regard and good wishes. I have observed his course as chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims of this House for a number of years; and I have observed particularly his course as a member of the select committee, of which I was chairman, during the last winter; and I can say, on behalf of that gentleman, that personally, his kind manner and amiable disposition endeared him to all who were connected with him; and as a politician, I can say that he was one of the most faithful of the party, and he bore his burthens with exemplary patience. I regret that he has thus escaped the resolution I offered the other day; but I rejoice that he has been removed by the Executive from this scene of turmoil here, and sent to a haven of rest abroad.

Reports from committees were then called for.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported a bill for the relief of Francis Mallory.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. TOUCEY reported a resolution to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of so much of the Message of the President as relates to the late Bank of the United States, and the reissue of its notes by its present trustee, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was concurred in.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAIG moved that a member on this committee be appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. MUHLENBERG; which was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. CHEATHAM reported a bill for the relief of Don Lewis R. Orillon.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. PHELPS moved that so much of the report of the Commissioner on Patents as relates to the subject of agriculture, be referred to that committee; which was agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BELL reported S. nate bill, without amendment, entitled "an act to amend an act entitled an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of lands, under the 14th article of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians in 1830."

Mr. B. explained the object of the bill to be to extend the time of the committee to the first of August next; and, on his motion, the House went into committee on the bill, Mr. OWENS in the Chair.

Mr. LYON said he considered this bill should be amended. By the former act the commissioners were empowered to issue subpœnas, but no provision had been made for their being served. Mr. L. submitted an amendment, making it the duty of the United States

Mr. BELL hoped he would not press it then, but suffer the provision to be made in a separate bill.

Mr. LYON had no desire to delay the passage of this bill, though he was satisfied some stich provision as he had proposed should be made; and he withdrew the amendment.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill without amendment; and, after a few remarks from Messrs. McKAY, BELL, DAWSON, and LYON,

Mr. DAWSON moved its postponement till Monday next.

Mr. HAYNES briefly opposed the motion; and, after a few further remarks by Messrs. DAWSON, BELL, HAYNES, PARKER, and POPE,

Mr. DAWSON modified his motion so as to postpone the bill until to-morrow, and make it the special order of the day for the morning hour; which motion was agreed to.

The bill from the Senate to abolish the Circuit Court at Huntsville, Alabama, was taken up, read twice, and, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, [after an ineffectual effort, by Mr. CHAPMAN, to procure its third reading.]

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to amend the act of the 3d of March, 1837, entitled an act supplementary to the act to amend the judicial system of the United States.

PRIVATE ORDERS.

The CHAIR then announced the private orders.

Mr. EVANS asked if the Executive communication from the President of the United States, in relation to the Maine boundary, was not the first subject in order?

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the CHAIR would not decide that private business took precedence of Executive communications on the Speaker's table, as it was with great difficulty that the public business could now be reached.

The CHAIR then stated the question to the House, and took its sense upon it; and the House decided that private business should take precedence.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of proceeding to-day with the Executive communication on the Speaker's table; which motion was disagreed to.

The bill authorizing the Washington National Monument Society to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington on the public grounds, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to establish a pension agency at Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. McKAY moved to postpone its further consideration until Friday next.

After a few words by Messrs. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, McKAY, and PETRIKEN, the motion to postpone was disagreed to.

Mr. OWENS then called for the reading of the report accompanying this bill; which being read, Mr. O. briefly opposed the bill in its present form, because it was based upon a report which he could not consent to as being correct. He was willing that the heirs of Robert Fulton should receive some compensation for his invaluable services, but he was not disposed to give it in its present form.

Mr. WISE briefly supported the bill in its present form, because it was not intended to give the heirs of Robert Fulton a gratuity. It was to give that to the heirs which they were entitled to rereceive, as a compensation for Mr. Fulton's services to the Government.

After some further remarks by Messrs. McKAY, WHITTLESEY, HOFFMAN, CRAIG, and RUSSELL,

Mr. RUSSELL moved to reduce the appropriations from one hundred thousand to twenty-five thousand dollars.

After some further remarks by Messrs. HOFFMAN, RUSSELL, WHITTLESEY, and McKAY.

Mr. RUSSELL modified his motion so as to strike out the whole appropriation, so as to leave it to be a blank, to be filled by the House.

After some remarks by Messrs. HOFFMAN, LEGARE, CHAMBERS, and BIDDLE,

Mr. DUNCAN, after a few remarks, moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Friday in March; which was disagreed to.

Mr. PETRIKEN moved that the House adjourn: lost.

Mr. McKAY gave notice that if the motion to strike out prevailed, he should move to fill the blank with $50,000.

Mr. RUSSELL then called for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out, which were ordered, and were—yeas 80, nays 111.

So the motion to strike out was disagreed to.

Mr. HAYNES moved to strike out $100,000, and insert $50,000.

Mr. WISE moved the Previous Question; which was seconded by the House—ayes 91, noes 72, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. GRIFFIN called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered, and were—yeas 112, nays 69.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Mr. DUNCAN then moved a call of the House: lost.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. GRIFFIN moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of making a motion that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. G. then submitted his motion, and

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the yeas and nays upon said motion; which were ordered, and were, yeas 77, nays 61.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a communikation from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the case of Charles S. Sibbalet, referred to that Department from the Committe of Claims; which, on motion of WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 11th of January last, in relation to certain claims of Indians in the State of Missouri; which, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. REED,

The House then adjourned to meet on Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, Feb. 12, 1838.

CHARGE OF CORRUPTION.

Mr. WISE rose, and said, Mr. Speaker, I have a subject of the deepest importance to bring to the attention of this House, a subject which involves the honor and the purity of Congress, and the purity of the whole Government. Sir, I bring to the attention of the House a direct and unequivocal charge, against a member of the Congress of the United States, of corruption; a charge which is openly made by the editors of two responsible papers in this country, who vouch that the charge can be proved by a responsible witness or witnesses. Sir, I will read it, as I have extracted it from the New York Courier and Enquirer, and upon this paper I shall demand, from this House, an investigation.

Mr. W. then read the statement referred to, which will be found reiterated in his motion below, after having read it.

Mr. W. resumed as follows: Now, sir, this "Spy in Washington" is an anonymous writer, and I shall not notice him in the proceeding, but here is a responsible editor, who vouches that this charge can be proved. The charge is made in the most direct manner, and Congress is called upon to defend its own character and its own honor; and I therefore ask this House, at once, to appoint a committee, and give them full power to send for these witnesses, to inquire who they are, and who that member of Congress is, and let the whole matter be investigated and reported upon to the country. Here was an opportunity now offered.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say that I will not be responsible that this charge can be proved: far from it. I hope it may turn out either to be false or a mistake. I believe myself that corruption, in an indirect form and in a general sense, does exist, but I have never supposed that any one had been daring enough to offer to sell his Executive influence. Sir, if this be true; if influence is to be sold to contractors or speculators by members of either House, I will adopt the sentiment I have lately heard pronounced "reform or revolution, liberty or death." Sir, I hope the House will not refuse to grant the committee.

Mr. W. then moved the following resolution:

Whereas, the following publication appears in the New York Courier and Enquirer, to wit:

"CORRUPTION IN CONGRESS.—We yesterday published a letter from 'the Spy in Washington,' directly charging a member of Congress with corruption, and offering to prove the charge before a committee of either House, when called upon for that purpose. We republish the charge to-day, and call upon Congress promptly to institute the investigation thus challenged, both as an act of justice to itself and to the country. 'The Spy in Washington,' it may be said that he is not an ostensible or responsible person; but we desire at once to obviate this difficulty, by stating, as we now do, that he is known to us, and that whenever called upon by a committee of Congress, we pledge ourselves that he shall be forthcoming, and that he is one whose standing warrants an immediate proceeding on the part of Congress.

Extract from yesterday's Courier and Enquirer.

"The more brief my statement, the better it will be understood. It is in my power, if brought to the bar of either House, or before a committee, and process allowed me to compel the attendance of witnesses, to prove, by the oath of a respectable and unimpeachable citizen, as well as by written documentary evidence, THAT THERE IS AT LEAST ONE MEMBER OF CONGRESS WHO HAS OFFERED TO BARTER HIS SERVICES AND HIS INFLUENCE WITH A DEPARTMENT OR DEPARTMENTS FOR COMPENSATION. 'Why, sir,' said the applicant for a contract, 'if my proposition has merit, it will be received. If it has not, I do not expect it will be accepted.' And what do you think was the answer of the honorable member? I will give it to you in his own emphatic language. 'MERIT,' said he; 'WHY THINGS DO NOT GO HERE BY MERIT, BUT BY PULLING THE RIGHT STRINGS. MAKE IT MY INTEREST, AND I WILL PULL THE STRINGS FOR YOU.'"

Therefore, Resolved, That a select committee of members, with power to send for persons and papers, be appointed to inquire into the charge of corruption therein contained against a member of Congress, and they report to this House; that as soon as the committee ascertain the name of the person accused, they give him notice to appear before them and attend such examination, and that they report to this House.

Mr. CILLEY said that as the course proposed to be pursued on this occasion was novel and extraordinary, he hoped the House would pause before it embarked in this business, on such authority as was produced. This charge comes from an editor of a newspaper, and we all know that in a country where the press is free, few men can expect to escape abuse and charges of a similar description. Ordinarily, when we are about entering upon a business of this kind before a magistrate—a conservator of the peace—the charges submitted are obliged to be made distinctly, clearly, and under the solemnity of an oath; and why should we now depart from this well known and well settled rule? He knew nothing of this editor; but if it was the same editor who had once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $52,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think that his charges were entitled to much credit in an American Congress. If he has charges to make, let him make them distinctly, and not vaguely. Let him make them under the solemnity of an oath, and then it will be quite time enough to act. He trusted the House would not go into an investigation of this kind, on a mere newspaper statement, without any proof.

If we look, we will see what had been said by the public press against Washington, Jefferson, Madison, the two Adamses, Jackson, and Van Buren, yet the people passed upon the merits of all these men, and afterwards the press retracted much that it had said against them. If the House thought differently from him, it could pursue a different course; but it seemed to him that some more definite charge than this ought to be made out before it acted. It was giving too much importance, in his opinion, to this newspaper editor for this House to institute an investigation upon his mere statement, without any proof whatever. He considered that all public men were liable to have charges of this kind made against them; and if their characters were not sufficient to bear it without an investigation into the matter before a committee of the House, they were not fit to be the representatives of the people. If a man was slandered in this way, the people would do him justice, and afterwards the press would do him justice, because "truth is mighty and will prevail." He was in favor of the utmost freedom of the press; but this was an inconvenience attending its freedom, which every man ought to be prepared to bear. He thought the gentleman from Virginia himself, upon reflection, would come to the conclusion, that this charge was too vague and undefined to warrant the action of the House upon it.

Mr. BRIGGS said that, after the very extraordinary and unaccountable opposition which the gentleman from Maine had made to this resolution, and the very singular reasons he had adduced in opposition to it, he must call for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

The yeas and nays were thereupon ordered.

Mr. MERCER said that no gentleman had a greater aversion to making this body the arena for the introduction of paragraphs from newspapers in order that gentlemen might vindicate themselves from the charges made in them, than himself; still he considered this matter of such a character as to require the notice of this House. The individual who made this charge was a known and responsible individual, and if the charge turned out to be untrue, he could be made answerable before the tribunals of the country in heavy damages. It had been made after due consideration, and attaches itself to every member of the House; then are we to sit here under a direct imputation, a direct charge, of this kind hanging over us? He trusted no opposition would be made to the inquiry. He regretted exceedingly that matters of this kind should be brought before the body, but in this instance he thought the House ought to institute the inquiry into the matter asked for.

Mr. WISE said the gentleman from Maine had started with the old tune that you must have specific charges preferred before an investigation can take place. That is the amount of the gentleman's idea, and that was the idea of the whole party at the last session of Congress, from the President of the United States down to the officers in the lowest departments. Before you make charges every thing must be known, every thing must be specific, and the whole case made out. Now he (Mr. W.) would pledge himself, although he was not able just now to lay his hands upon the evidence, to show instances of investigations being gone into on newspaper charges more vague and general, and less specific, than this; and he trusted that no man who was jealous of his own honor, of the honor of the House, and purity of the Government, would stop to inquire about the specifications, when he was thus impeached. This House ought not to hesitate to go into this inquiry; and he would now say to the gentleman from Maine, that gentlemen of his party ought to be the last to hesitate about this inquiry. The name of the person implicated is not given there, but he wished to be permitted to say to the gentleman from Maine, that that gentleman was much more likely to be meant than him, (Mr. W.) because, said Mr. W. I have no influence with the Executive Departments to sell—none whatever. I can go home to my constituents free from any such suspicion; for just as certain as I apply for any thing for one of my constituents, he is sure not to get it; and if I tell the department that one of them is a rogue, that one is sure to be appointed to office. Who is it that has influence to sell? It is those who belong to that party with which the gentleman from Maine acts. He hoped the charge might prove to be untrue; but he hoped there was not one other gentleman of that party who, in all probability, was implicated, that would hesitate about making this inquiry. What is the object of this inquiry? It is to make that certain and fixed, which is now uncertain and doubtful. It is to ascertain the name of the member of Congress, and the head and front of his offending, that this inquiry is asked; and he trusted that no pleas of specific charges would now be urged against it. He considered this charge sufficiently specific; and he would tell those gentlemen who alone could be implicated by it, that they had better pause before they voted against this inquiry. They could go on, and, if they chose, vote nay on this occasion; but he would tell them that they need not try to shield themselves under cover of the freedom and licentiousness of the press, because the imputation would rest upon them, if they refused to institute the inquiry, and clear the matter up. The member ought to be known, be he Senator or be he Representative. The Editor of the paper alluded to, was responsible for the charge he had made, and although the letter to which the Editor referred was anonymous, still it was over the signature of the "Spy in Washington," and that letter writer is as well known here as the Editor of the Courier and Enquirer. This letter writer referred to documentary evidence to prove the fact which he asserts, so that the name of the member of Congress must be to this agreement, or whatever it may be, and he should like to see that gentlemnn's signature who would place it to such an instrument as this.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was under considerable suspense as to what he should do when he first heard his colleague announce this subject, and he was struck with the great indefiniteness of the charge. His colleague, however, had since rendered it a little more specific, and now charged that it was some one among the friends of the Administration.

Mr. WISE explained that the presumption was that it was some who had influence to sell.

Mr. BOULDIN said whoever was alluded to was unknown to him, perhaps much more so than to the gentleman himself, for it was impossible for Mr. B. to know any thing about it. But when the character and honor of the members of this House were thus implicated, in the first instance all being involved, and then again one side taken out, and all on that side indiscriminately involved, while the other was entirely excluded, and he himself a member of the side included, he could not remain altogether silent. Mr. B. knew what was the effect of such matters; and he had witnessed, on a previous occasion, the imprudence of gentlemen saying any thing when these round charges were made. In the instance alluded to, the whole House was generally charged with having been drunk on a certain occasion, and a man undertaking to say something for the House was condemned, so far as Mr. B. knew, throughout the United States, as a drunkard, though Mr. B. never saw him take a glass in his life. So would it be again if, when any of their brethren got up and made a charge against the whole House, or against half of it, the member who would get up to repel it would himself run the risk of being held guilty of it.

Mr. B. said he never felt so much at a loss in his life to know what sort of a vote to give, though he was at no loss to know the effect the resolution would have upon the House, and every member of it as a member; for they, none of them, could, by any sort of exception, so contrive as to except themselves. In so much, and as far as, the House itself was disgraced by being indiscriminately charged with this, or that, or the other offence, no man, a member of it, could possibly be excepted, no man could help involving himself. He would not make any charge, but could they expect to bring together two hundred and fifty men, without some of them being not quite as good as they might be, and were they to set about ferreting out the truth or falsehood of every malicious and lying paragraph of the newspapers that chose to publish these things? They were, however, in this position: that, if they refused to investigate, it would be in the mouth of some that they were afraid to go into it, and if they did go into an investigation of this kind, they would soon have very little character to investigate.

Mr. BOON said that he understood that another Committee of Investigation was asked for to inquire into the alleged dishonesty and corruptions of members of Congress, brought before the country by irresponsible spectacle letter-writers, who have been permitted to lounge about this hall, to vilify and slander the members of this House. Sir, these letter-writers charge that a certain member of Congress offered to sell his influence to the Administration; and, by another of these letter-writers it is alleged that a sum of money was lately stolen from the Sergeant-at-Arms by members of Congress. Sir, knowing as I do, that neither of these foul charges apply to me individually, I shall not, by my vote, give importance to these base slanderers of the reputation of honest men. Sir, let one of these letter-writers dare to apply their false charges to myself personally, and I will settle the matter by applying my fist to his spectacles. Sir, I repeat that, if one of these spectacle letter-writers will dare to apply such basely false charges to myself personally, and will avow himself to be the author of the calumny, I will, so help me God, punish him out of this House, with those weapons which the God of Nature has endowed me with.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio was understood to express his regret that this resolution had been introduced, but inasmuch as the charge implicated every member of the House, and affected the honor and character of the House itself, its reputation demanded that this investigation should take place. The plan proposed was, in his opinion, the most suitable one, and the history of this country was replete with precedents, a number of which were cited by Mr. W.

Mr. POPE considered that the House of Representatives was bound to institute this investigation, and referred to various precedents to show that inquiries had been instituted into charges of a similar character.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, that although this charge was not as definite as he could wish it, still he thought the resolution ought to be adopted. He should, however, like to have it modified, so as to state whether it was a member of this House which was charged, because he thought it improper in this House to institute an inquiry in relation to charges against members of the other House. If, however, the charge was against a member of this House, he thought it due to the character of the House, and to the character of the individual, whoever he might be, that the investigation should be had. He was unwilling that this imputation should rest against any member of this House, because he did believe that it would turn out to be unfounded, or, if the language used should turn out to be true, that it would be so satisfactorily explained that the individual will be exonerated from all criminal intention, or intention of doing a corrupt act.

He hoped, however, that the gentleman from Virginia would make the modification he had suggested, so as to make the resolution point to the fact, whether it is a member of this House, which may be implicated.

Mr. WISE said this was made as though he was making the charge. The charge was made by another and a responsible, and all he asked was that the House might inquire into the facts, and see if the charge was true. If it was found to be a Senator, instead of a Representative, the committee could report that fact to the House, and it can do no harm.

Mr. DAWSON would suggest to the gentleman to make his resolution a joint resolution.

Mr. GLASCOCK presumed it was known by some one here whether this charge was against a Senator, or member of this House, and whom it was made against. It had been said, to be sure, that the letter alluded to was anonymous; but it must be recollected that the "Spy in Washington" is well known here, and he presumed that person would not hesitate a moment to give the name of the individual referred to, or at least to go so far as to say whether he was a member of this or the other branch of Congress; and if this individual, (the Spy) who was now within the hearing of his voice, would come down from his present position, and say whether it is a member of this House, he believed this resolution would be agreed to by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. WISE. Suppose it is a member of the Senate.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Then I would move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WISE. Have we not as much right to investigate corruption in a member of the Senate, with a view of impeachment, as of a member of this House?

Mr. GLASCOCK. This might be all right enough, but he thought the most proper course for us to pursue in relation to this matter, was first to ascertain whether it was against a member of this House, and then we could more properly institute the inquiry. If it was against a member of the other branch of Congress, he had no doubt but that body would institute the proper inquiry. He thought this matter ought to be more specific; still he was prepared to vote for it.

Before he sat down, he would state that other charges of a serious character had been made against members of this House, by a letter writer for a Boston paper, based upon remarks made by two honorable members from the State of Ohio on this floor; charges which were against the whole body calculated to fix a stain upon the character of every individual member of the House. He alluded to the difficulty which had arisen between the Sergeant-at-Arms and a bank of this city, in relation to a certain money transaction which had been brought to the notice of the House. Well, sir, the letter writer alluded to did indirectly, if not directly, charge the members of this body with having purloined the money from the Sergeant-at-Arms. He thought it at the time due to the House that this matter should have been inquired into, and more especially so in consequence of the remarks made on the occasion by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio said that he must certainly have been misunderstood in the remarks which he had made on the occasion alluded to. He had certainly not charged upon any member of the House the taking of the money lost by the Sergeant-at-Arms. He had spoken of the loose manner in which the money had been kept, it being in a room where every person that pleased might have access to, and he had said that it might have been lost in this way; but he disavowed having made a charge against, or entertaining any suspicion of, any member on this floor having taken the money.

Mr. BOND also disavowed all intention of imputing the loss of the money on the occasion alluded to to any member of this body.

Mr. GLASCOCK was glad that those gentlemen had disavowed all intention of imputing the loss of the money to members of the House, and was happy to receive their explanation; but he believed those remarks had made an impression upon persons here of a different character from this; and he presumed that the Boston letter-writer had based his assertion on the general remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. So far as the present resolution was concerned, he thought the proper course would be to adopt it; but he would greatly prefer it if it was modified to meet the suggestion he had thrown out. When these charges were made against individual members of the House, or against the character and dignity of the House itself, he thought they required that an investigation should be had into the matter, so that the purity of the body might be sustained.

Mr. WISE said he had stated that it was proper that this inquiry should take place by the House, even in case the person implicated should turn out to be a Senator, in order that he might be impeached. It had been suggested, however, that this could not be done, as none but civil officers could be impeached under the Constitution. If this should turn out to be the case, however, the committee could report this fact to the House. Gentlemen had spoken of charges being made by members of this House. I, said Mr. W. have made charges of corruption upon your Executive, your heads of Departments, and, in some instances, against this House. He would say, however, that he was at all times responsible for any thing he might say, to whoever may feel himself aggrieved.

In this case, however, he was not the accuser; but he had told gentlemen who was the accuser. His colleague (Mr. BOULDIN) had referred to an occurrence which took place here some years ago, when he (Mr. W.) had charged some of the members of the House with being drunk, and his colleague seemed to be ridden with the ghost of that charge. Now, if his colleague meant to assert that members of Congress had not been drunk in their seats, he (Mr. W) would prove that they had. So much for that.

He trusted this inquiry might be had, and he hoped the charge would turn out to be false, he feared however, that it would turn out to be true. He knew nothing of the facts himself, he had seen the charge made in the public prints, and he had brought it to the notice of the House, and thus far he had discharged his duty.

Mr. BOULDIN would reply to a single remark of his colleague. What Mr. B. meant by alluding to the incident he had, he thought almost any man who had any sense at all well understood, but he would try and explain further.

What he meant was this: that, if the members of this House charge the members of this House in their places with every infirmity to which they may be liable, and publish it to the wide world, that, in doing so, they will publish but those infirmities which are common to human nature, and known to be so, and they will also publish but their own infirmities. And where is the advantage of doing so? he asked.

This he had mentioned as a case that might happen, because it did happen. If, however, any member upon this floor thinks he is clear of all infirmities, then let him be a censor morum. For himself, Mr. B. did not come upon this floor to charge the House of Representatives with being more liable to corruption than any other body in the world; nor did he come there to charge his brothers with any thing, nor to seek into their infirmities. Perhaps he could name things or do things about this or that person in or out of the House, but what could the House do? If it gets into investigating, and inquiring into, or alluding to, the peculiar infirmities of each member thereof, he should like to know what would be the end of it, and what would be the length of it. Mr. B. did not doubt but that the gentleman might prove that he had seen some of his brother members on this floor drunk. He would not say the gentleman could prove it, or that he could not, on any occasion, but it was a case in which, by making a broad charge against the whole House, without identifying the charge against any individual, he that submitted and kept himself quiet was condemned with the whole House, and he that said a word was condemned also.

Mr. WISE. Will you vouch for the man alluded to?

Mr. BOULDIN said he would as soon vouch for the individual referred to as for any man, for he never heard of his being intoxicated, but he had often heard of the effect produced—that it was said to have touched him particularly. Now, the gentlemen said that remark haunted Mr. B. that is, the fear haunted him so as to make him sensible that, in that case, it had the effect he apprehended every such thing would have. If gentlemen would get up on that floor, and repeat charges of newspapers, this paper may be as good as any other for aught he knew; but if they would repeat these charges, and ask for an inquiry, he that voted for it did, in Mr. B's opinion, do a thing which placed the House in a position of general guilt, and he who refused to vote for it, made himself obnoxious to the charge of being guilty.

Mr. WISE said he had made no charge, but brought the attention of the House to a charge made by another.

Mr. BOULDIN replied that what he meant to say was exactly the thing reiterated by his colleague. He comes into the House, brings a newspaper paragraph to the notice of the House, and asks the House to inquire into it; and Mr. B. insisted that, if you vote against it, or speak against it, you render yourself liable to be implicated; and if you vote for it, or speak for it, you are liable, with the balance of the House, to be set down as one of the number. That was his meaning. Perhaps Mr. B. might vote for it, though at first he was doubtful whether he should or not; for either way, if this course was persevered in, the time was not far distant when the House would have very little character to vote about.

Mr. WISE. So I think too.

Mr. BYNUM said that the position which seemed to be taken here was, that when newspaper charges were made, no matter how indefinite, there must be a committee to investigate them. This, however, was a position which he utterly denied. If this thing is carried out, we shall have nothing but confusion, degradation of this body, and anarchy in the end. We know that charges are daily manufactured here to order, and sent out through the country, for the purpose of destroying the character of those in favor of a Democratic Administration of the General Government. But, sir, before gentlemen take notice of these charges in the manner now proposed, they should look to the character of the sources of them, and inquire whether they were worthy the notice of a grave, deliberative body. Is it not known that there is a set of hirelings sent here from year to year from your large cities, which are under the influence of banking corporations, to hold a rod over the heads of your members of Congress? Well, who are your "Spies in Washington," and your host of other hirelings, employed for the purpose of defaming the representatives of the people? Why, sir, they are a set of individuals which would disgrace any man who comes in contact with them. They are a set of men who batten and fatten upon the slang and slander of bar-rooms and tippling shops, and no honorable and honest man can came in contact with them. For his own part, he would shun them as he would shun a viper. Where is the member of Congress who would associate with this herd? If there was any who was in the habit of associating with them, he should like to know it. Mr. B. confessed that he did not know how these wretches got the information which they did, without having intercourse with members of this body; but he had always thought that no member would degrade himself so much as to be caught in their company. These creatures undertake to review the characters of your members of Congress, your President, and your whole Administration; and they do so at the order of those who employ them. The manner in which they are employed shows the character of the men, for every honorable man would revolt at the idea of being employed in such a manner. He had often wished to know by what authority these creatures were admitted within the walls of this Hall, and permitted to take seats on the floor of the House. He had searched the rules of the House in vain for such authority, but he never had been able to find it. Why, sir, it would be an endless matter to go into an investigation of all these charges. Have you forgotten the bold charge which was made a short time ago in the Boston Atlas against members of Congress, alleging that they had robbed your Sergeant-at-Arms? This charge was made by one of these individuals, employed for the purpose of slandering honorable and honest men. These are the kind of men whose charges are to be made a matter of serious inquiry in this House. But he was most surprised at the gentleman from Georgia, calling upon "Old Specs" to come down here from the gallery and tell us what he meant in the charge he had made. If the gentleman was disposed to go this far, why not permit this individual in "specs" to come in take a seat among us. He was sorry to see that there was a want of firmness on the part of many gentlemen to resist a thing of this kind. He had no fear of any imputation resting upon him, and if any gentlemen would dare to make charges against him openly, he would take such course in relation, as the case might demand; but if a drunken vagabond attack him in the street, he would not stop to quarrel with him, because he would then only be bringing himself into disgrace.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, at this stage of the proceedings, on leave, made a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was entered and lies over.

Mr. HOPKINS said if the charge was of the character described by the gentleman from North Carolina, he should have some doubts about voting for the proposition; but this was of a different character, and he would vote for the inquiry, and if the charge was sustained, he would have the member expelled. He hoped the charge would turn out to be untrue in fact, but it ought to be investigated.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said if he had been left to himself, he should have regarded the publication in this newspaper as he should the idle wind; but when it was brought before the House, he was for investigating it in the most solemn and imposing form. He could not, however, vote for the resolution in its present shape, and he submitted an amendment, in the form of a substitute, retaining Mr. WISE's preamble, and after the word "Resolved," the following:

"That the subject matter of the charge contained in the foregoing publication be investigated at the bar of this House, and that a subpœna be issued to require his attendance touching the same."

Mr. JENIFER suggested whether it would not be better to take the preliminary steps before a committee.

Mr. CILLEY and Mr. WISE made some mutual explanations.

Mr. LOOMIS said he should vote for this investigation, not upon the strength, however, of the anonymous communication, but because the character of members of the House was concerned. He was for investigating the subject in the most direct manner possible, by bringing Mathew L. Davis to the bar, and requiring him to testify as to what he knew about that paper. Mr. L. moved an amendment to that effect.

Mr. DUNCAN said he was opposed to going into the investigation. We have come here for higher and more valuable purposes than to resolve ourselves, day after day, into a court of inquiry to investigate our own characters, and at the expense of the public's money, and to the neglect of the public business. He asked if the sun had rose during the present session without bringing to light some base calumny against some member of this House, or the House aggregately, over the signature of some one of the base, corrupt, and penniless scoundrels who beset your Capitol in hungry swarms. He asked if it was intended to investigate every base charge that made its appearance; if so, we must abandon the business of the public entirely, however interesting and important it might be; and instead of being a House of Representatives, constituted to serve the public, resolve ourselves into a great court of inquiry, not to try others, (the legitimate object of every judicial tribunal,) but to try ourselves, and pronounce judgment in our own case and behalf. Sir, I hope no such policy will be adopted or commenced. This scurrilous, dirty communication is the production of one who is well known by the term of the "Washington Spy." This man, who now sits overlooking you from the gallery, brooding calumny and detraction, black, base, and foul, is the apologist and eulogist of Aaron Burr—(He is worthy of such a purpose.) But we are told by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. JENIFER,) that this investigation ought to go on; the charge he understands to come from a respectable source. A respectable source!!! The gentleman from Maryland would not make the statement of respectability, if he knew the general character of the "Washington Spy;" he would not defame and blacken the term "respectable" designedly, by applying it to a retch so base and degraded as the Washington Spy now in my eye. Perhaps the gentleman from Maryland has been taught, as has your humble speaker, to revere the head that is bald, and the eye that is dimmed by age, and from this laudable veneration was led to the abuse of the term "respectable," of which he has just been guilty. Sir, Elisha had a bald head, he was a just man, and feared God, but does it follow that every man who has a bald head is a just man, and has the fear of God before his eyes, or is entitled to the appellation of "respectable." It is probable that Elisha's eyes had grown dim, and that if spectacles were in his day discovered, he wore them, but I will ask my friend from Maryland, if every man who wears spectacles is an honest and an upright man. No, sir: we have a specimen of the converse of the propositions now before us, in the person of the Washington Spy. Sir, what further evidence do you want, or does the country require, that the author of this base slander, is a scoundrel, a liar, and a coward, than the fact that he has withheld his proper name. If you hear of a man at the city of Georgetown, passing himself off by the name of A B—at the city of Alexandria by the name of C D—at your Navy Yard by the name of E F—and at Bladensburg by the name of G H, what other conclusion would you be likely to come to, in relation to that man, other than that he is a horse thief, a counterfeiter, or some base felon who merits a residence in your District penitentiary. Such kind of character is presented to us in the person of the Washington Spy. But, sir, this is not the place to try him: I say we have higher duties to perform here: not the duties that appertain to ourselves, but those that appertain to the country.

Further, sir, I deny that any thing which the Washington Spy may say or publish is worthy of an investigation in this House or elsewhere. I say so because I consider him so morally depraved, and so degraded in the estimation of every honorable and high-minded man, that he is literally incable of the crime of slander. I mean by this, sir, that he is so notorious a liar, and so generally known to be such, that he is incapable longer of telling a falsehood. A gentleman asks me how that can be. I answer, that a falsehood is a moral perversion of the truth for the purpose of deception; but the Washington Spy is so notorious and degraded a liar that he can no longer deceive; therefore, the object or purpose intended failing, the falsehood fails with it. Sir, I shall vote against the original proposition, and if any member will move to lay the proposition and all the proposed amendments on the table, I will vote for the motion.

Mr. REED was in favor of investigation, but not in the mode proposed by Mr. DROMGOOLE; for that would defeat the object intended.

Mr. FRY said, according to his notion of this matter, he thought the House would best maintain its honor, its dignity, and its character, by abstaining from any notice of the effusions of the newspaper scribblers who infest this hall, and treat such publications with that contempt which they, when impeaching any of the members, certainly merit.

If the editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer, or any other person, wishes to make a journey to this city, and remain here a few weeks in the character of a witness before this committee, which it is proposed to raise, so as to come here at the public expense, I, for one, am not disposed to gratify them. I do not say that is the design: I speak for a contingency.

If the "apparition" that has haunted this hall since I have been a member of this House, which has been designated to me as the "Spy," has any charge to make against any member of this House, let him make it; let him publish his name; let him openly accuse him of whatever crime with which he may be chargeable. If a member were thus charged, and thought himself aggrieved, and would ask an inquiry, I would grant it; but I am utterly opposed to the House taking notice of any newspaper slang, to the exclusion of the important business of the country. In order, therefore, that the House may dispose of this subject, and go on to refer the petitions which now load our tables, I move the resolution and amendments lie on the table.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 14, nays 179.

The question then recurred upon Mr. LOOMIS'S amendment.

Mr. McKENNAN said the investigation had become necessary, for otherwise the charge might rest upon himself, or upon the Speaker, or upon any other member.

Mr. FILLMORE was well assured that the House was not the proper body to investigate this charge, though he thought it better that the name of the individual should be stated to the House, and then the truth of the charge might be inquired into by a committee. Mr. F. was opposed to sending the matter to a secret committee, to sit and collect testimony on the character of an individual without his having an opportunity of being heard in his defence.

Mr. POPE was in favor of having the report of a committee of investigation as a preliminary step, and then it would be the proper time for the House to take direct cognizance of the subject.

Mr. THOMAS remarked upon the injustice there had been done to some one member of the House, whom he knew not, but the discussion having progressed to this point, he wished the resolution so amended as to cause the writer to appear at the bar of the House and name the member, and then send the subject to a committee.

Mr. WISE modified his resolution so that when the name of the member was given to the committee, he should be notified thereof.

Mr. LOOMIS modified his amendment, by requiring Mr. Davis, when brought at the bar of the House, to name the person implicated, and the source of his information.

Mr. BRIGGS adverted to the inconsistency of gentlemen denouncing anonymous letter writers, while the individual was known to every one of them, and to the country, their remarks were addressed to him in the gallery, and they proposed an amendment in which his name was distinctly mentioned. Mr. B. also went on to show that it would be much more unjust to the person implicated to have his name given at the bar, and heralded forth upon every wind, than to have it disclosed to a committee, which committee would instantly notify him of the fact.

Mr. BYNUM had no doubt the charge had been made from a mere rumor, with no other foundation, and to bring so lying a scamp as the propagator to the bar of the House, would be only elevating him to consequence. A similar charge had been made by another New York letter-writer, that the respectable member from Baltimore (Mr. McKIM) had been favored with a contract, when there was not the remotest foundation for the calumny. Another had charged that the members of the House had purloined the money missed by the Serjeant-at-Arms, and both those writers were admitted to seats on the floor, and to mingle with the members. As to the present subject, Mr. B. was opposed to bringing the "Spy" to the bar, and was opposed to the whole investigation, because he would not condemn a member of that House upon such testimony.

After some further remarks from Messrs. JENIFER, FILLMORE, REED, and McKAY, at the suggestion of the latter gentleman,

Mr. WISE modified his proposition, by restricting the investigation to members of the House, and by bringing Mr. Davis to give the name at the bar.

Mr. DROMGOOLE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RIVES moved to insert after the words "member implicated," "if a member of this House."

Mr. PATTON moved an adjournment: lost.

After some remarks by Messrs. BOON and TURNEY, Mr. RIVES'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then gave notice, that if this resolution should be rejected, he would move the original one.

Mr. THOMAS then moved an adjournment: lost—ayes 72, noes 91.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then moved to insert the original resolution as a substitute.

Mr. WISE preferred the original himself.

Mr. CUSHMAN then demanded the previous question, being on the substitute agreed to as above; which was not seconded by the House—ayes 83, noes 85.

Mr. CRARY moved an adjournment: lost 76 to 90.

Mr. WISE moved to strike out the words "if a member of this House."

Mr. UNDERWOOD accepted of this as a modification, on the understanding that a motion would then be made to insert it.

Mr. HAYNES then moved to insert the words "if a member of this House."

Mr. THOMAS called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered.

After a few remarks by Messrs. MERCER, DROMGOOLE, HAYNES, TURNER, WISE, and UNDERWOOD, on motion of the last gentleman, and without taking the question,

The House adjourned at quarter past six o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 12, 1838.

The Chair announced a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement from the Register of the Treasury, in answer, in part, to a resolution of the Senate calling for a statement of the balances remaining in the Treasury at the end of each year from the year 1789 to the present period: laid on the table.

The Chair also communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in answer to a resolution of the Senate calling for a statement of the public lands sold.

Mr. ALLEN presented the resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio on the subject of the public lands and the currency; which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 12.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Mr. MERRICK presented a communication from the Governor of Maryland, containing the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of that State in reference to the recommendation in the President's Message to establish a national foundry. The resolutions, Mr. M. said, requested the Maryland Senators and representatives to bring the subject to the notice of Congress, and to use their endeavors to get the foundry located at Havre de Grace. Mr. M. then moved that the preamble and resolutions be printed, and referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. TIPTON said he did not rise to oppose the motion of the honorable Senator from Maryland, (Mr. MERRICK,) but to inform the Senate that the subject of a national foundry had been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred so much of the President's message as relates to an armory in the West, a foundry and depot of arms, and had directed him (Mr. T.) to report a bill on that subject, which he was prepared to do. The committee had not felt it to to be their duty to locate the sites of the foundry or armory. That could be more properly, and he thought, more satisfactorily, done by the Executive, or military arm of the Government. The West had a right to demand the immediate location and construction of an armory on the Western waters. The committee had before them a memorial from Gen. Hinds, proposing to furnish water power at the great falls of the Wabash. Many places in other States were proposed; but the location could, he thought, be safely left with the Executive.

Mr. MERRICK said he would then vary his motion, so as to refer the documents to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROANE felt it a duty he owed to the State he represented, to say that she also had claims in reference to the location of this foundry; and he hoped, before the committee reported, they would take these claims into their consideration.

At the request of Senators MERRICK and ROANE, Mr. T. would suspend his report for the present.

Mr. BUCHANAN was glad that the honorable Senator from Indiana had thought proper to delay his report. His (Mr. B's) constituents had an interest on the subject, and he had received communications in relation to it from highly respectable citizens of Maryland.

He was pleased with these resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, and was gratified to find that they approved for once of a measure recommended by President Van Buren, and hoped to see this approval followed up by others. He was also much pleased with the very amiable manner in which the Legislature of Maryland had treated their Senators: they requested instead of commanding. In his State, Mr. B. said, all parties believed, and, in his opinion, believed correctly, in the right of the Legislature to instruct. No doubt, to some, a request would be more agreeable than a command.

With regard to the site recommended by the Legislature of Maryland, so far as he knew of its locality, it was entitled to be favorably considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. It was central in its situation, and from it there was carriage by water to every part of the Union. If it should be thought that Havre de Grace would be too much exposed, there was a site in the same State, some eight or nine miles above, on the river Susquehannah, possessing equal advantages in other respects; and where, he believed, there was as great a water power as at Havre-de-Grace, and also from whence arms might be transported with the same facility to all parts of the Union.

Mr. MERRICK was glad that the Senator from Pennsylvania was pleased that one act of the President had found favor in the sight of the State he had the honor to represent. He could assure that honorable gentleman, that the good people of Maryland were always willing to award the meed of praise for any act that might tend to promote the general good. He would agree with the Senator that a request was at all times more agreeable than a command; and at this particular juncture, he had no doubt that the Senator felt the force of what he asserted; but with regard to himself and colleague, Mr. M. said they were at all times ready to respond to the wishes of the people; whether communicated in the shape of requests or commands. He was much pleased, however, to find the Senator favorably disposed to the measure recommended by the State of Maryland, and that he approved of the position selected. Mr. M. thought it would certainly be found to combine more advantages than any other within her limits; and went into a full description of its situation, its proximity to the great bay of the Chesapeake, its connection with the canals and railroads stretching far into the interior of Pennsylvania, its being the terminus of all the vast chain of internal improvement, and forming, at the same time, a most convenient post for an arsenal for provisions and munitions of war, thus giving to it a decided superiority over any other position that could be selected. Mr. M. said he had also a petition from sundry citizens of Havre de Grace in relation to the same matter, which he would like to have referred to the same committee.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of 540 citizens of Hartford, Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending in the Senate in relation to the public finances; and after some remarks from Mr. W. the petition was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of Moses Sergeant, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SWIFT presented several petitions from Vermont, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union, and praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia: those relating to Texas were laid on the table; and the motion to receive the others was also laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented a large number of petitions from citizens of Massachusetts, which he said he would not trouble the Senate with particularizing, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union; and also, praying for the abolishment of slavery in the District of Columbia. The petitions relating to Texas were laid on the table, and the motion to receive the others was disposed of in like manner.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had been charged with the presentation of a number of petitions on the same subjects, which he would take the present occasion to present. Mr. W. then read a list of several petitions, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Among these, was one signed by four thousand women, and when Mr. W. named that petition,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama inquired whether the memoriolists were married or single women?

Mr. WEBSTER replied, if the Senator from Alabama was a single man, he might ascertain on inquiry of them.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rejoined that the object of his inquiry was to ascertain whether they had no better employment. He added, it might now be seen, by recollecting the votes and conduct of certain gentlemen on a recent occasion, how and by whom such memorials were gotten up.

He then moved that the motion to recommit the the memorials be laid on the table, which was carried.

Mr. WEBSTER then presented a number of memorials, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union, among which were the preamble and resolutions, adopted at a meeting of certain citizens of Boston, held at Faneuil Hall.

Mr. KING called for the reading of these resolutions, and they were read accordingly.

[The resolutions are very bitter in their denunciations of slavery, and arraign in severe terms the characters and motives of the Texans.]

Mr. WEBSTER said that he did not intend to accompany the presentation of these memorials with any remarks, but as the reading of one of them had been called for, he would say that he did not wish to be committed to any thing said on that particular one. He would state, that he did not feel any obligation to press that part of the resolutions which related to the organization of the Texas Government. The independence of Texas had been recognised by the Government of the United States, and deserved therefore to be treated by us as a sovereign State. As to the other parts of the memorial, his opinions were well known.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that he had raised his voice so often on that floor, on the subject of these resolutions, that he had almost determined not to speak on it again; but he would only say, that if Senators did not now see what was coming, they must be blind indeed. These petitioners asked what it was clearly unconstitutional for Congress to grant. The slave question in Texas was as much removed from interference here, as it was from the interference of Great Britain. The agitation of this question was a flagrant wrong done the South. We have, said he, a right to enjoy our property without question and without disturbance; and yet in that common hall of legislation, provided for them by the patriotism of their ancestors, what must be the results if it was converted into an arena for assault on one side, and defence on the other?

He asked how long this state of things was to be continued? and if it was to go on, he asked gentlemen how long? He believed that it was time for discussion on the subject here to cease. He knew that the South had seemingly been hitherto lethargic, looking on with calm indifference at the progress of her adversaries; but gentlemen were mistaken if they thought that the South looked on with indifference. Mr. C. said that this state of things was not unforeseen by him, and he had announced it in advance. He now told gentlemen that it must cease, or it would lead to the overthrow of one of the most admirable Governments that ever existed.

Mr. CUTHBERT said he would like to have the names of the presiding officers and secretaries of this meeting read; and they were read accordingly.

Mr. BENTON observed that he was attending to business on his table when the language in which Texas was spoken of caught his ear; and it struck him as strange language to be used in reference to any power whose independence we had acknowledged. He would ask the Secretary again to read that part of the resolutions relating to Texas.

The Secretary read that part of the resolutions, as follows:

"Whereas, certain persons, styling themselves representatives of other persons assuming to be the Government of Texas, have made overtures to the Government of the United States for admission into the Union," etc.

And in another part of the resolutions, it is asserted that the Government of Texas was not established in the pure spirit of liberty, but in treason, ingratitude, and fraud; and stigmatizes the officers of the Government of Texas as fugitives from justice, conspirators, etc.

Mr. WEBSTER disavowed any intention on his part of offering any disrespect to the Senate in the presentation of these petitions; and he was persuaded that no such feeling was entertained by the petitioners. It was a subject on which they felt deeply, and had expressed themselves warmly, without entertaining the slightest disrespect to any portion of the members of this confederacy.

The memorials were then laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial of a number of citizens of Pittsburg, similar to those presented by him some days since, praying for the establishment of a marine hospital at that place: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN also presented the memorial of a committee in behalf of the officers of the Army of the United States during the second war of independence, praying Congress to grant them lands and place them on the same footing with the officers of the first war of independence: referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented two petitions from citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of a number of citizens of Elizabeth city, North Carolina, praying for an appropriation for a light boat in Albemarle sound; also, a memorial from several citizens of North Carolina, praying for an appropriation for placing buoys in Powhatan sound and Pasquotank river; both of which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of sundry citizens of Carroll county, Ohio, asking the repeal of so much of the Post Office law as requires payment of postage on newspapers published in a county and transmitted to a post office in the same county: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, leave was given to John Boyer to withdraw his petition and papers.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill supplementary to the act concerning the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the reissuing of the notes of the late Bank of the United States by the new bank of the same name, chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill entitled "An act to prevent the reissuing and circulation of the bills, notes, or other securities of corporations, whose charters have expired." The report having been read, and ordered to be printed, the bill was read the first and second times, and made the order of the day for next Wednesday week.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved for the printing of ten thousand extra copies of the report; which was agreed to—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate a certain pre-emption claim to land in Indiana;

Also, a bill for the relief of the children and heirs of Wm. Fisher, deceased;

Which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TIPTON presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana on the subject of the continuation of the Cumberland road; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice and referred:

The bill authorizing the managers and officers of the Washington Monument Society to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington on the public mall.

The bill to provide for paying certain pensions at Tuscaloosa, Alabama: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of the administrators of Edward W. Duvall.

The bill to change the times of holding the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, held at Richmond; and

The resolution authorizing the purchase of certain books for the use of the committees of the Senate.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Senate resumed as the unfinished business, the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill; when Mr. NILES, who was entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the Senate in an argument of great length, and of much force and ability, in favor of the measure. Before concluding, however, he yielded the floor at a late hour to

Mr. KING, on whose motion, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13, 1838.

The House resumed the consideration of the subject under discussion last evening, the question being on the motion of Mr. HAYNES to insert the words, "if a member of this House," as stated above.

Mr. WISE rose, and read a reiteration of the charge from the "Newark Daily Advertiser," the Editor of which endorsed the statement upon his own knowledge, and stated further that it was a Senator of the United States now in his place.

Mr. SMITH made a few remarks on the subject, and then moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. RIVES asked the gentleman to withdraw it, to enable Mr. R. to assign a reason for voting against the motion.

Mr. RENCHER asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 46, nays 137.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. HAYNES said he had voted to lay the resolution upon the table, in consequence of the facts stated in the paper referred to by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) this morning. He did not now rise for the purpose of protracting this debate, which had already occupied too much of our time, but to endeavor to bring it to a close. He therefore moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House—ayes 83, noes 73: and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CONNOR called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution; which were ordered, and were, yeas 140, nays 46.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then issued his subpœna, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to summon Matthew L. Davis to appear at the bar of the House.

Mr. HOWARD would inquire whether it would be in order to offer a resolution directing the mode of proceeding when the witness shall be brought before the House?

The CHAIR stated and read what the parliamentary law on the subject was, and said that it would be in order to offer a resolution directing the mode of proceeding.

Mr. HOWARD then submitted a resolution, that the Speaker be directed to have the publication in the Courier and Enquirer read to the witness, and then propound to him—first. Are you the author of the letter here published? Second. Do you allude in that letter to a member of the House of Representatives? If so, what is the name of the member? And in case the witness replies that he does not mean a member of the House, he shall be discharged, and all the proceedings before the House terminate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD would inquire if we adopt this resolution, whether it would be in order for any member of the House to propound any other inquiries to this witness. Suppose he wished to ask the witness who gave him the information upon which he had made the statement in the letter, where he resided, and whether he was a person of sufficient character to justify it, or what the documentary evidence was which he alluded to, was he to be prevented by this resolution from asking these questions?

The CHAIR replied, if the resolution should be adopted, and the witness answered the interrogatories in the negative, then all proceeding would be at an end; but if he announced them in the affirmative, any gentleman would have the right to propound inquiries to the witness.

Mr. WISE would ask the gentleman from Maryland to so modify his resolution as to do away with all technical objections to it. The interrogatories of the gentleman from Maryland were addressed to the witness as the "Spy in Washington," and as such he might refuse to answer them, when, if they were addressed to him personally, as Matthew L. Davis, he would doubtless answer them. Mr. W. drew a distinction in relation to this matter, and contended that the witness would have a perfect right to refuse to answer the interrogatories propounded to him as the "Spy in Washington." The gentleman from New York, in his resolution, had resolved to bring Matthew L. Davis to the bar of the House; and why not propound the inquiries to Matthew L. Davis, instead of the "Spy in Washington?" The inquiry, in this form, might be considered as inquisitorial, and as such he might refuse to answer it.

Mr. HOWARD said it was not his intention to throw any obstacles in the way of this inquiry, but he thought the resolution was in quite as good a form as if it was changed in pursuance of the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia. This matter had been brought before the House on the authority of the "Spy in Washington," and the House had been challenged to institute the inquiry. Then why not propound the inquiry in this form; and if the witness refuses to answer, the charge must fall, and the House be freed from the imputation, and he should not desire to prosecute it any further.

Mr. PATTON said his colleague (Mr. WISE) had designated the first interrogatory of the gentleman from Maryland as inquisitorial. He (Mr. P.) considered the whole proceeding as inquisitorial.

Mr. WISE explained, that by putting the questions to Matthew L. Davis, he might answer them in that form, when he would not consider it proper to answer them, if they put it to him as the "Spy in Washington." Mr. W. could see great distinction between the two cases.

Mr. PATTON considered all proceedings of this kind as inquisitorial as all criminal proceedings are; but they were not to be designated as of the character of a Spanish inquisition, as some proceedings of this House had been designated on a former occasion. He considered that the witness could answer as well interrogatories put to him, in relation to a publication over a fictitious signature as over his own signature, and if he proved the charges he had made to be true, he would be considered a public benefactor, and if they proved to be false, let him stand all the penalties which may be imposed upon him.

Mr. WISE hoped that the interrogatory, "are you the author of that letter," would not be propounded to the witness, because the witness might stand mute as he had a right to do, and if he stood mute, the hurrah would be raised by your official organ and other papers of the party, that here were charges made against the Congress of the United States, that those who made them would not stand to.

Mr. EVANS then moved to strike out all after the resolution, and insert the following as a substitute for the interrogatories proposed by the gentleman from Maryland:

"First. Do you know who is alluded to, or intended to be charged, in the preceding letter? Answer yea or nay, as the fact may be, without giving the name. Second. Is the person thus alluded to a member of this House? If this is answered in the affirmative, then, Third. What is the name of the member? If the interrogatories are answered in the negative, then all further proceedings shall cease."

Mr. CRAIG preferred the original resolution to the amendment. The allegation which had been made, and which had been the basis of the action of this House, was made by the "Spy in Washington." Then, when this witness is brought before the House, let him answer if he is the "Spy;" and if he answers that he is not, then we have nothing further to do with him.

Mr. GLASCOCK could see no objection to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. This charge had been made in a responsible paper; and he hesitated not to say that if Matthew L. Davis, or the "Spy," had any regard for his character, or for the character of the paper which contained this charge, he would not, in the face of this House, or of the country, refuse to answer the question. For one, he was disposed to have this question propounded; and if the witness thought proper not to answer, be it so; and then he would take the interrogatories of the gentleman from Maine. If he was the friend of M. L. Davis or of the Courier and Enquirer, he would not attempt to avoid these interrogatories; and if the witness attempted to shrink from them, he was a different kind of person from what he (Mr. G.) had always supposed him to be.

Mr. WISE explained that the witness might very properly decline to answer the interrogatory as propounded by the gentleman from Maryland, when he would answer it if propounded to him in a different mode.

Mr. GRENNELL briefly supported the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, as being preferable to that of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HOWARD then, for the purpose of meeting the views of gentlemen around him, moved his proposition as follows:

"Resolved, That the Speaker direct the publication to be read to the witness, and then propound to him the following:

"1. Are you the author of the foregoing letter, and whether he declines or not, then the Speaker shall put the following to him:

"2. Do you know who is alluded to, or intended to be alluded to, in the foregoing letter, without giving the name?

"3. Is the person alluded to a member of this House? And if this is answered in the affirmative,

"4. What is the name of the member? And in case the witness states that he did not allude to a member of the House, then he is to be discharged, and all further proceedings are to cease."

Mr. ADAMS objected to the resolution in this form, and considered the last modification as even more objectionable than the original resolution. He considered it entirely improper that the House should put questions to a witness, and permit him to say whether he would or would not answer them.

Mr. HOWARD considered that the House was placed in an attitude of self-defence in relation to this matter. It was now ready to meet the inquiry in relation to the charge which had been made against it. Then let the witness shrink from the inquiry which he had challenged, and the honor of the House would be vindicated, so that there would be no necessity for for any further proceeding.

Mr. BRONSON then demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. GRENNELL called for a division; and the question was then taken upon the resolution of Mr. HOWARD, in three divisions; all of which were agreed to by the House.

The Sergeant-at-arms was then directed by the CHAIR to place Mr. DAVIS at the bar, and he was brought in.

As the Speaker was about to administer the oath to the witness,

Mr. DAVIS required the form of the oath first to be recited to him, which was done; and he was then sworn, and being placed at the bar,

The SPEAKER addressed him as follows:

Mathew L. Davis: It has been made my duty, by the order of this House, to cause to be read in your hearing a publication in the Courier and Enquirer of New York, and it will be read to you by the Clerk.

The article in question, as given in the proceedings of yesterday, having been read,

The SPEAKER propounded the first interrogatory.

Mr. DAVIS then addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am arraigned at the bar of this House without counsel or aid, and I most respectfully ask you that I may be permitted to state my own case, so far as I conceive my rights invaded, that I may be permitted to present any reasons why I ought not to answer that question. (Cries of "Agreed, agreed.") I can assure you, sir, and through you this House, that I will occupy but a few minutes. ("Agreed, agreed.")

The CHAIR was propounding the question to the House if it would consent to hear the reasons why the witness declined answering the question—

Mr. DAVIS. I do not decline answering the question, sir, but wish to state the reasons why I ought not to answer it.

The CHAIR was again about to propound the question, when

Mr. BRONSON requested that the preliminary question be first propounded, whether the witness declined answering the question, because, if he did not, Mr. B. should object to the other being put to the House.

The SPEAKER to the witness. Does the Chair understand the witness declines answering the interrogatory propounded to him?

Mr. DAVIS. I beg leave, most respectfully, to state to the Chair and to the House, that I wish to present those reasons, if I have any, why I conceive I ought not thus to be interrogated. Having assigned them, it is possible, sir, that I may answer that or any other question the House may be pleased to propound to me. I respectfully ask to be heard myself, for I have no counsel.

Mr. BRONSON and Mr. TURNEY simultaneously called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BRONSON, stating that he wished to debate the question on the suggestion of Mr. ADAMS, under the parliamentary law, the witness was withdrawn from the hall.

Mr. BRONSON said if he understood the question then presented, it was, substantially, whether they should permit Mr.

Davis to come before that House, and make them a speech. For one, Mr. B. was opposed to any such proceeding as that. If the witness came forward there, and said he declined to answer the question put to him, then Mr. B. would cheerfully vote that, in the absence of counsel, he might assign his reasons for so declining; but until he did positively decline to answer the question, Mr. B. never would consent to the witness standing there, and participating in the debates of the House, entitled to all the privileges of a member. Upon what principle was it that this witness should be suffered to make them a speech, perhaps of two days' duration? Did they call him before them to hear a speech from him, to hear an argument, or for him to answer a question? For one, Mr. B. would never stand there and permit the rights of the House to be violated in this manner.

Mr. BOON entered his solemn protest against permitting any individual who had assumed to himself to charge, seriously, a member of that or the other House with a grave offence, and then, when he was called upon to bring testimony in proof of it, to do nothing but abuse the House and the members of it; for that would, doubtless, be the amount of his speech, if he was permitted to make one. Moreover, this individual asked what, to Mr. B's knowledge, had never been asked of any any court of justice or any judicial tribunal on the face of the earth, viz: to answer a question by argument. It was preposterous—it was ridiculous.

Mr. B. would admonish gentlemen that there was another consideration which would present itself to the American people, and that was, the amount of money already consumed in the discussion of this question. Two days had already been taken up in thus bringing incidental party politics before the House, for it was as well ascertained and known to them all that the accused was not a member of the House as any thing could be, if they were to give credit to the unqualified newspaper statement furnished by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) this morning. Why, then, proceed any further? It was only wasting the time and money of the people.

Mr. THOMPSON denounced the opposition to Mr. DAVIS's application as tyrannical and arbitrary.

Mr. HAYNES expressed his surprise at the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON) That gentleman had spoken of the course proposed to be pursued towards the witness, Matthew L. Davis, as tyranny and oppression. He had represented the witness as dragged to the bar by the arbitrary power of the House, and made himself his champion, to defend him from its outrageous oppression. But what is the true history of the case? The "Spy in Washington" had dared us to bring him here to testify to a charge, involving most deeply the character and honor of the House. He was a volunteer witness, daring as to bring him up for examination; and now, forsooth, was made by the gentleman from South Carolina the victim of the grossest tyranny and oppression. It is said that the witness ought not to be compelled to answer, because he was only presumed to be the author of the letters of the Spy in Washington. Mr. H. said his answer to this was, that if not the author, the question exposed him to no responsibility whatever; and if he was the author, he was bound to answer the interrogatory. He came here at his own instance; he was a volunteer witness; had dared us to examine him touching a charge involving most deeply the character of the House, and now is to be shielded from the performance of his own voluntary pledge to testify, by his right to send out anonymous publications. His own conduct has stripped him of such defence; and he, for one, would never consent to give him permission to submit any reasons why he should, or should not, answer the proposed interrogatory. Of the character of the witness he had nothing to say; nor should he now draw any inference, either one way or the other, from his attempt to evade a responsibility which he had defied us to permit him to assume.

This question was discussed at length, the application of Mr. Davis being sustained by Messrs. WISE, LINCOLN, PATTON, THOMPSON, and SIBLEY, and opposed by Messrs. BYNUM, FOSTER, PARKER, HAYNES, GLASCOCK, and HOLSEY; when

Mr. HOWARD rose, amid the most vociferous and general cries for question, and expressing his gratification at the disposition he witnessed to take the question, said he would make a motion to facilitate their wish; I therefore, sir, added he, demand the previous question.

The House seconded the motion—ayes 119, noes not counted; and the main question was ordered, without a division.

The CHAIR then propounded the question to the House in the following terms:

Shall Mr. Davis, the witness, have leave to state his reasons to the House why the first interrogatory should not be answered?

Some conversation arose between Mr. RIVES and the CHAIR as to whether this was the precise words of the application; but the main question having been previously ordered, no change could be made.

Mr. WISE said if there was any difference, it was, at most, only the difference "between tweedledum and tweedledee."

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 90.

So the House determined that the witness should give his reasons.

Mr. EVERETT then moved that the House adjourn: lost.

Mr. Davis was then brought in and placed at the bar, and briefly gave his reasons for not answering the question. He then read the following as his answer thereto:

"I deny the right of this House to ask, and therefore decline to answer, the question, whether I am, or am not, the author of the 'Spy in Washington,' or the extract from the letter referred to in the interrogatory; but, at the same time, I respectfully state that I know the author, and I know the member to whom the Spy alludes, and am prepared to name him here or elsewhere."

"That, sir," said the witness, "is my answer."

To the second interrogatory the witness answered "I do."

To the third. "If the person alluded to is a member of the House of Representatives?" The answer was, "He is not."

The CHAIR then said, the witness, under the order of the House, is therefore discharged from further examination, and there is an end of this proceeding. He will, therefore, retire from the bar.

Mr. OWENS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WISE hoped that the gentleman would withdraw that motion to enable him to move a communication of this examination to the Senate. [Cries of "no, no" from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. GRAVES asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; but they were refused, and the motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

The following resolutions, adopted yesterday, were omitted in reporting the proceedings of that day:

On motion of Mr. KING,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for placing buoys at the mouth of St. Johns river, in Florida.

On motion of Mr. MOUTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the officers of the branch mint, established in New Orleans.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Patent Office be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law which requires the recording of assignments of patent rights in the city of Washington.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to furnish to the Senate a copy of the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury, or any officer of his Department, and the district attorney of North Alabama, or his immediate predecessor, on the subject of the debt due from the late John Brahan, deceased, as receiver of public money at Huntsville, which has not been already communicated to the Senate; and, also, a copy of any correspondence which has taken place between the said Department or any officer of it, and any other person, on the same subject.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 13, 1833.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with the resolution of the 2d instant, calling for the names of the receivers of public moneys (if any) who have violated the Treasury order of the 11th July, 1836; laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRENTISS presented the petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The motion to receive was laid on the table.

Mr. PRENTISS also presented the petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Julius Nelson and others of the State of New York, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Silver Creek, Lake Erie: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McKEAN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of that State, requesting their Senators and Representatives to use their exertions to procure for the State the pre-emption, at the minimum price, to the lands acquired by the late treaty with the Miami Indians in that State, to aid the State in her works of internal improvement; which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NORVELL said he was charged with a memorial from the Columbia Typographical Society of Washington, composed entirely of letter-press printers. The memorialists remonstrate against the passage of any law recognising or establishing the principle of international copy-right for the benefit of foreign authors. This society was composed of a body of highly intelligent citizens, as enlightened as any other body of men in the country. They were necessarily so, from their pursuits and professions in life. Their views and opinions, on this subject especially, were entitled to peculiar weight. As this subject was before the Committee on the Patent Office, he moved that the memorial be read, printed, and referred to that committee: the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from Charles Sanguenet, asking for the passage of a law to confirm his claim to a certain tract of land in Wisconsin: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of Nathaniel Cowper, agent of College.

Mr. SEVIER presented the petition of Alvarez Fisk and the representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Ferguson J. Morrison, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Arkansas, praying for the establishment of a mail route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for the establishment of certain mail routes: referred to the same committee.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route: referred to the same committee.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of New York, on the subject of the currency; which, after some remarks from Mr. W. was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD offered the following:

Resolved, That no petition or other papers which may have been referred to any committee of the Senate, and which may have been reported thereon, shall hereafter be withdrawn from the files of the Senate without leaving a certified copy of all such papers in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD said he did not offer the resolution with a view to its immediate adoption. He had thrown it before the Senate, in order that it might be taken up hereafter, when duly weighed and considered. Mr. H. said he had been long enough in public life, to learn that claims grew much better, the longer they were before Congress. If, when first presented, the evidence was such as not to suit the nature of the case, the papers were withdrawn, and all the weak points fortified, and the testimony so changed as to preserve little or nothing of its original character. The object of the resolution was simply to prevent a repetition of that mode of proceeding in future, and that no original paper should be withdrawn, without leaving a certified copy in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to Joseph Fletcher for the loss and destruction of a wagon and team, and other property, in the public service, during the late war; and that the papers of said Fletcher be referred to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate all the information in the possession of his Department which may relate to the Oregon Territory; and, also, that he cause to be made, for the use of the Senate, a map embracing recent discoveries of all the country claimed by the United States in the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, to the Pacific ocean.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making allowances for mileage to the judges of the circuit courts of the United States, in such manner as to equalize their compensation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Sanford; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Matthew St. Clair Clarke.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition and documents of Michael Hogan.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of Richard Cravatt Handy Perry and David Chaney; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the pre-emption law of the 19th of June, 1834; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bills from the House for the relief of Melancton T. Woolsey, and for the relief of Captain William H. Bell, reported them severally without amendment; the latter unfavorably.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of David Ross.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of ——— Conway, deceased.

Mr. WHITE, from the same committee, to which had been referred the resolution, directing an inquiry into the expediency of placing the officers of the staff of the Revolutionary army on the same footing with officers of the line, as to grants of land, made an unfavorable report thereon, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice, and referred:

A bill for the relief of Richard Bennett;
A bill for the relief of David G. Bates;
A bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd;
A bill for the relief of John Richey;
A bill for the relief of John L. Scott; and A bill for the relief of David McNair.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to confirm certain land claims in Louisiana; also, a bill for the relief of Charles Morgan of Louisiana; both of which were read, and ordered to a second reading, and the accompanying reports were ordered to be printed.

The bill to prevent the counterfeiting of the gold, silver, and coper coins of the United States, or of any foreign country, was read the third time and passed.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the southern boundary of the Territory of Wisconsin to be ascertained and marked, was also read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, as the unfinished business; when

Mr. NILES resumed the floor, and finished at a late hour, the very able speech which he commenced yesterday in opposition to the amendment offered by Mr. RIVES, and in favor of the original bill. Mr. N. said though the Senator from Virginia seemed to think that his twenty-five banks constituted the whole country; but what constituted the whole country in the opinion of Mr. N. was the producing classes who were swindled out of their labor through the paper system. Mr. N. glanced at the rotten state of the banking system in this country, and its vast increase of paper, (in some instances forty-one dollars for one of specie,) until it had blown up, exploded and scattered ruin far and wide. There were banks, he said, that had not yet broken, but were now rocking and trembling; so much so, that persons in their immediate neighborhood would keep their notes no longer than they could get rid of them; and yet we were called on to deposite the treasures of Government, the common property of the people, in banks like these. That the currency of the nation was in a deplorable condition, all admitted; but the remedy was the subject of dispute. The question was one of vast magnitude, and of vital importance to the people of the nation, and it was deeply to be regretted that it should have become mixed with politics; but, unfortunately, it had so, and all the evils were charged upon the present Administration; how justly, would be left to the good sense of the people to determine. What had the Administration sought to do? Merely to increase the metallic currency, which it had effected to a very considerable extent, and to suppress the issue of small notes. This was all that had been done by the present or past Administrations to derange the currency of the country. Some gentlemen contended that it was "tampering with the currency" that had brought on its present deranged state. As well, said Mr. N. might we charge temperance societies with all the drunkenness that occurred, because they were tampering with sobriety. [As soon as the reporters can write out from their notes, this speech will be presented in the columns of the Globe.]

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

The Senate adjourned

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1838.

As soon as the journal of yesterday was read—

Mr. WISE moved to amend it, by inserting the oath administered to Mr. Davis yesterday, together with his answers to two of the interrogatories propounded to him.

The CHAIR stated that in no former instance had the oath ever been recorded: and it was contrary to the express and positive law, laid down in Jefferson's Manual, to insert the answers of a witness given to the House. This was only done in examinations before committees, because the House was not present.

This position was sustained by Mr. ATHERTON, Mr. PARKER, Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and Mr. TOUCEY, and contested by Mr. WISE; when, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, the motion was laid on the table without a division.

Mr. BOON then moved to strike from the journal the answer of the same witness to the first interrogatory, which had been spread upon the journal at the witness's request, having been handed in in writing, and so entered under the supposed implied assent of the House.

Mr. BROMGOOLE had not given his assent to it, and protested against his silence ever being construed as implying his assent to any motion.

Mr. WISE opposed the motion as an expunging process.

Mr. BOON said the gentleman had himself explained away all the odium that might be supposed to attach to the expunging process, by his previous declaration, under his own motion, that the journal was not complete; and it was surely as proper to amend the minutes by striking out as by inserting.

Mr. RIVES advocated the motion at some length.

Mr. TURNEY had not only not given his assent to the request of the witness, but had made several ineffectual attempts yesterday to obtain the floor to oppose it.

Mr. GRIFFIN moved to lay the motion to amend on the table.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays, and inquired of the Chair if, should the motion to amend prevail, the part stricken out would be entered on the journal of to-day.

The CHAIR replied that it necessarily would, as showing the ground of the House's vote.

Mr. MERCER thereupon withdrew the call for the yeas and nays, Mr. OWENS renewed it, and they where ordered.

The motion to lay on the table prevailed—yeas 104, nays 79.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, the rules were suspended to call the States for petitions and memorials.

The CHAIR, on leave, laid before the House the usual annual communication from the Treasury Department, in relation to Consuls on the Barbary coast.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, laid on the table.

Petitions and memorials were then called for in the order, commencing at the point last left off, viz: Massachusetts, and were presented by Messrs. ADAMS, GRENNELL, FLETCHER, CUSHING, HASTINGS, PHILLIPS, CALHOUN, LINCOLN, REED, and BORDEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHN Q. ADAMS then rose and stated that he had before him about three hundred and fifty petitions, signed by between thirty-four and thirty-five thousand names, which he had been requested to present to this House. He wished to do so with as little consumption of the time of the House as possible. He had, therefore, been obliged to alter the manner pursued heretofore in presenting petitions separately, one by one, announcing the place from which the petitions came, the name of the first petitioner, and the number of names signed to such petitions; instead of which he proposed now to offer them by classes, stating the number of petitions in each class, and, as well as he could, the number of petitioners included in each. He would state, however, that he had a considerable number of petitions in relation to which he himself entertained doubts as to whether they came under the general order of the House, which prescribed that petitions of a certain description should be laid upon the table without reading, or any other action of the House being taken upon them. It has happened, that in consequence of the decision of this and former Houses of Congress in relation to the right of petition, a great degree of excitement has been produced in a certain portion of the country, and the effect of this proceeding, on the part of the House, and of the excitement occasioned by them, had tended very much to multiply these petitions, which the House appears to be so little disposed to receive and to treat in the manner in which, in his opinion, all respectful and decent petitions ought to be treated. One of the consequences of this course of proceedings on the part of the House was, that petitions were sent to him of an anonymous character, ambiguous and equivocal. These were of two descriptions. One description came from a geographical portion of this country very much attached to the right of petition and opposed to the order of the House on this subject, and some of them would not come under that rule.

Mr. PICKENS rose to order. He only desired to know if this question was to be opened up in this direct manner, that he might be prepared to meet it.

The CHAIR stated what the usual course was in relation to the presentation of petitions.

Mr. ADAMS reiterated that he had about 350 petitions to present; and he made this statement, giving his reasons for changing his course in relation to their presentation, in order that the time of the House might not be consumed. Mr. A. was about proceeding with his statement, when

The CHAIR called him to order.

Mr. ADAMS then said if he was not permitted to make the statement to the House, he should be compelled to present his petitions separately, which would take up the whole day, and perhaps another day.

The CHAIR replied that the same law would apply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, which governed all the other members of the House.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded to present his petitions, some separately and some by classes, some of which were referred. Those which related to the question of slavery were laid on the table, under order of the House; those in relation to the annexation of Texas, those praying for a repeal of the order of the House, and all others which were supposed to relate in any way to slavery, were laid on the table, on motions made to that effect.

Petitions were then further presented by Messrs. CRANSTON and TILLINGHAST, of Rhode Island.

Messrs. TOUCEY, HALEY, HOLT and INGHAM, of Connecticut.

[Mr. HALEY presented the petition of Wm. W. Wolsey and others, citizens of New York, Connecticut, and elsewhere, praying for an appropriation to build a light house on a small island on Homach, in Fisher's Island Sound, near the Connecticut shore. Also, to establish a floating light at or near Latimer's reef, in said Fisher's Island Sound. These, together with a small appropriation to remove a sand bar in the harbor of Stonington, Connecticut. Mr. H. also presented the petition of 73 persons, inhabitants of Plainfield, in Connecticut, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Likewise, the petition of 93 persons, inhabitants of Woodstock, in Connecticut, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories.]

[Mr. HOLT presented the petitions of Mrs. Cynthia Trowbridge of Connecticut, asking a grant of land, in consequence of services rendered by her late husband, Ira Trowbridge in the service of the United States, who was killed by the Indians; of John Snow of Mansfield, Connecticut, praying to have his name placed on the pension list; of Stephen P. W. Douglass of the State of New York, praying Congress to adopt a resolution to enable him to receive in his own name, letters patent for an invention of Hozzara Knowles. esq.]

Messrs. FLETCHER, HALL, and ALLEN, of Vermont.

[Mr. FLETCHER offered the following petitions: Petition of M. Mory and 109 females of Greensboro, Vermont, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Petition of John Hill and 35 others, inhabitants of Morgan, Vermont, against the annexation of Texas to the Union. Petition of M. Mory and 109 females of Greensboro, Vermont, against the annexation of Texas to the Union. Petition of John M. Robinson and 52 others of Charleston, Vermont, for rescinding of the resolution of Dec. 21, 1838. Petition of A. Packer and several others, inhabitants of Newark, Vermont, for rescinding of the resolution of the House of Representatives passed Dec. 21, 1837. Petition of John McLevan, of Barnet, Vermont, praying for remuneration for expenses, &c.]

Messrs. PARKER, McCLELLAN, BICKNELL, KEMBLE, ANDREWS, MOORE, CHILDS, BRODHEAD, MITCHELL, PALMER, MARVIN, BRUYN, HOFFMAN, CURTIS, FILMORE, SIBLEY, TAYLOR, NOBLE, LOOMIS, BRONSON, PATTERSON, GALLUP, GRAY, DeGRAFF, RUSSELL, GRANT, PECK, CAMBRELENG, and SPENCER, of New York.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG presented a memorial from a number of merchants of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the Express mail law. Mr. C. also presented several petitions for private claims.]

[Mr. McCLELLAN presented the petition of Spencer Stafford and Gorham A. Worth, praying to be relieved from further prosecution upon an official bond executed by them as sureties for a paymaster in the last war: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.]

[Mr. ANDREWS presented two petitions from citizens of Steuben county, New York, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Alleghany river, between Pitsburg and Olean. One from 50 citizens of Yates county, New York, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. A petition of 78 electors of Woodhull, Steuben county, New York, for the same. A remonstrance from the same persons, against the annexation of Texas to the Union. A petition of citizens of Pulteney, Steuben county, New York, for a pre-emption right to a township of unappropriated lands in the valley of the Mississippi. A petition of Lucy Barnes for a pension.]

[Mr. TAYLOR presented the following petitions of inhabitants of the village and county of Oswego, in the State of New York, praying Congress to inquire relative to the importance of Oswego as a military post, and the expediency of repairing and arming the military positions at that place. The petition of Abigail Wood, praying for a pension for the revolutionary services of her first husband, Luke Perkins, who was killed at the storming of Fort Griswold by the British, under the command of the traitor Arnold, on the 6th September, 1781. The petition of Stephen Appleby, to be placed on the invalid pension roll. The petition of Daniel Pratt, for a pension as an invalid. Also additional papers relative to the petition of Benjamin and John Depuy, for pensions.]

[Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Cephas L. Rockwood for relief. Also the petition of Abial Stites and 49 others, for the rescinding the resolution of the 21st day of December last, laying petitions on the subject of slavery on the table.]

[Mr. BRONSON presented the following petitions, viz: Petition of sundry citizens of Jefferson county, New York, asking for an appropriation for the preservation and protection of the harbor at Sackets Harbor, New York: referred to the Committee on Commerce. Also, petition of 76 citizens of Jefferson county, praying the House of Representatives to rescind the resolution passed by them on the 21st December, 1837, in relation to petitions on the subject of slavery. Also, petition of Daniel Redfield, praying remuneration for the loss of a vessel, destroyed by the enemy, while in the service of the United States: referred to the Committee of Claims. MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the official reports of Col. Zacharie Taylor, of the First regiment of Infantry, commanding in the action of the 25th of December last, with the Florida Indians, and giving an account of that action.

Mr. BENTON deemed it right to apprize the Senate of the object which he had in view in calling for an official communication of the reports mentioned in the resolution. He had seen these reports in the newspapers, and was of opinion that the Missouri volunteers, constituting a part of Col. Taylor's command in the action of the 25th of December, had been hardly treated, both in the action itself, and in the official reports which had been made of it. He had received no complaint from any of these volunteers on this subject; but he knew the men, and he had seen how they had been treated, and was of opinion that they had been hardly dealt with, both in the action, and in the report of it. They had been put in the fore-front of the battle, which was not their place in such an attack as was then made; and they had been censured for misconduct, when applause, and not censure, was due to them.

It appears from the commander's report, that the Indians, strongly posted, had waited an attack in a position where, covered from view, they could deliver a deadly fire upon an advancing line. It was clear that the first assailants must receive a deadly fire. There were nine hundred troops present, of whom about two hundred were Missouri Volunteers and Spies, and the rest regulars. The Volunteers and Spies were formed into a first line to make the attack; and of the regulars, five hundred formed a second line in the rear of the volunteers, and two hundred more formed a reserve, in the rear of the whole. In this disposition of the forces, it is clear that the Volunteers had a desperate service assigned them. They were to go forward as a forlorn hope, to draw the fire of the hidden enemy, and to absorb their bullets. It was a service for regulars, and not for volunteers—for soldiers by profession, and not for fathers of families and sons of farmers; it was a service for disciplined troops, and not for citizens fresh from the plough, who might have courage, but could not have discipline. The error of putting forward two hundred such troops, on such a service, while five hundred regulars remained behind in a second line, and two hundred more were held back as a reserve, is manifest to every observer, and seems to assume the appearance of exposing citizens to the fate of a forlorn hope.

Mr. B. was aware that volunteers were often sent forward to skirmish and to bring on an action, but this was not a case of skirmishing, but of attack upon the position and main body of the enemy, lying in wait to deliver a deadly fire upon the first assailants.

The orders to the volunteers were to fall back if heavily pressed, and to form in the rear of the second line. They were so pressed. They lost the one-sixth of their number in a few minutes, in killed and wounded, including their commander, and they fell back, some across the swamp, and employed themselves in taking care of their dead and wounded friends, and others to the rear of the second line, which they joined, and with which they continued to the end of the action. It is here that the error of the commander, in reporting this circumstance, becomes apparent. No allowance is made for undisciplined troops who had faced a terrible danger—who had lost their commander—who had suffered severely—who had their killed and wounded friends to take care of—who had discretionary orders to retreat—and who saw two hundred regulars idle as a reserve, while they themselves were urged back into the action.

The commander, in his report, disparages them without sufficent regard to these circumstances. He bestows a separate and distinctive praise upon the regular troops, which they well deserve, while the volunteers are blamed for "breaking" and retreating to the "baggage," and refusing to return in a "body" to the engagement. Now, as for breaking, it was seen that they had discretionary orders to retreat, if heavily pressed, and every retreat must become a breaking under such circumstances. None but veterans could have retreated in order under such circumstances. As for going to the baggage, it was certainly the place, and the only place, to which the wounded could be carried to receive the relief and attention which they required. And as for not returning as a corps, it is quite clear there could be but a broken corps to return, after the killed and wounded were deducted, and after the further deduction was made of those who were necessary to bring off these killed and wounded, and to give them the attendance which their sufferings required. After these deductions were made, there could not be much of a corps to return; and of the remnant left, it is stated in the official report that "many" returned, not as an organized body, but individually, and in broken companies, and fought it out to the end, while two hundred regulars, as a reserve, were only brought in at the close of the action.

Mr. B. thought the error of the commanding officer in his report, for he did not impute intentional injustice to him, was in expecting from volunteers the steadiness and the discipline of regulars.

The commanding officer takes, in the case of the Sixth Regiment, the number of its killed and wounded for the criterion of its merit and suffering in the action. The test is a fair one, and exhibits that regiment, especially five companies of it, as having encountered death with the greatest steadiness. It is a fair test; and let it be applied to all the troops, and then see how the Missourians will rank. The respective numbers and losses were thus: the Sixth Regiment, about 220 in action and 75 killed and wounded, being a loss of one third; the Fourth Regiment, 274 strong, 22 killed and wounded, being a loss of one-twelfth; the First Regiment, 200 strong, and 4 wounded, being a loss of the one-fiftieth; the Missouri Volunteers and Spies, 226 in number, and 36 killed and wounded, being a loss of the one-sixth. According to this test, the Missouri Volunteers should rank number second on the roll of merit, instead of being put to the bottom of the list, and then censured. But mere numbers will not show the relative merits and sufferings of the troops engaged. The element of time must be taken into the calculation, and then the merit of the Missourians rises to the first rank: for such was the intensity of the danger which they encountered, that they suffered their great loss in a few minutes, while the Sixth and Fourth Regiments were three hours in suffering theirs. This proves the difference in the degree of danger which the two descriptions of troops encountered.

Mr. B. said there was, in another part of the report, something of praise mixed up with censure, with respect to these volunteers. They are said to have returned the enemy's fire with spirit for a while, and to have done as well, or even better, than such a description of troops usually do. This bears a little upon all volunteers, and, he thought, erroneously, seeing how often such troops had done honor to their country. The people of the United States were constitutionally brave; and when the occasion required it, and they had a fair chance, they would always show it. They could not have discipline when fresh from their homes; and he thought the error of the reports to which he referred was in not making allowances for the want of discipline in these extemporaneous troops.

Mr. B. said he was under peculiar obligations to see that justice was done to these volunteers. They were his constituents, and had a right to look to him for a redress of their wrongs. They were fathers of families, and sons of farmers, living comfortably at home, and who had turned out at the call of the Government, generously and patriotically, to go an immense distance to serve their country. They had served it bravely and faithfully, had suffered severely, and were entitled to applause instead of censure. He had seen them at the moment of their embarkation, when they left their homes, in October last, full of hopes and full of courage, and had promised them the exertion of all his abilities to save them from every wrong, and to obtain for them every justice and every right to which they were entitled. With their brave and patriotic commander, General Gentry, he had been in bonds of friendship for twenty years. He was with you, sir, (addressing the Vice President, Col. JOHNSON,) at the river Thames, and was one of the foremost in the charge which you then led. He was a Major General in the militia of the State, but did not hesitate, at the call of the Government, to descend to the command of a Colonel, to raise a regiment by his own exertions, to lead it into battle, and to die at its head. He would not have complained of his position, if he had survived that day. No one of his command has complained to me. As brave men, they have taken the post of danger without complaint, and have acquiesced in the fate which the fortune of war has given them. They have asked nothing; but it is the place of their representatives here, and every where, to see that they have justice; and believing that they have been hardly treated both in the action and in the report of the action, I now call for the official communications, that such inquiries may be instituted as justice may demand.

Mr. B. said he had no object in view, but to defend the volunteers of Missouri from censure. If they had not been censured, he should not have moved in the subject. He had no intention to depreciate the merits and services of the officers and soldiers of the regular army engaged in Florida. He knew their service to be one of suffering, of hardship, of difficulty and of danger—a service in which every thing was to be suffered, and death encountered, with little opportunity to add to their military fame. But they had added to it. They had shown a courage and discipline which would do honor to any troops. They had done all that men could do. They have deserved well, and are now deserving well, from their country; and he trusted that their suffering and services would be remembered and appreciated by the Government and the country.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said that he had not understood the report of Col. Taylor to cast any reflections on any troops engaged in the action of the 25th Dec. and particularly on the Missouri Volunteers. He was bound by all his sympathies and associations to entertain the strongest feelings for the gallant volunteers of the West, and would be deeply pained to hear any imputations cast on them. He must, however, do Col. Taylor, who was well known to him, the justice to say, that if he was supposed to have cast any imputations on the Missouri Volunteers, he must have done it by inadvertence. A more brave, skilful, and determined soldier than Col. Taylor was not to be found in our service.

Mr. BENTON said defence, and not attack, was his object. He had disclaimed that from the beginning. He knew Col. Taylor to be a brave and meritorious officer, but he was of opinion that he had dealt hardly by these volunteers. The place given them in the attack was that of a forlorn hope, but of this he would not have complained, if they had not been censured, and, as it seemed to him, erroneously censured.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to furnish the Senate with a copy of the report of a survey of the harbor of City West, Indiana, with a view to its improvement.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance inquire into the propriety of so amending the law of 1830 as to allow States to import railroad iron wholly duty free, where it is exclusively for State purposes.

On motion of Mr. McKEAN,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to the heirs of Benjamin Harney, deceased, for services rendered the United States during the late war.

Mr. BUCHANAN, on leave, introduced a bill supplementary to the act entitled an act regulating processes in the courts of the United States and providing compensation for the officers of said courts, and for jurors and witnesses: read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, the bill supplementary to the act concerning the District of Columbia was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to provide for the legal adjudication and settlement of a claim to land granted by the Spanish Government to Julien Dubuque was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and after some remarks from Messrs. KING, LINN, and WHITE, it was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the bill to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States for the ninth circuit was taken up: and after being amended, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate resumed as the unfinished business, the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill; when

Mr. SMITH, of Connecticut, rose and addressed the Senate for some considerable time, in favor of the bill. He deprecated the course pursued by those who were opposed to the measure, in denouncing it in advance, before it had been discussed; and inferred, from the stand taken by them, that they either had no arguments to offer against it, or that they indulged a sovereign contempt for the understanding of the people. Mr. S. was of opinion that sober reason was always best adapted for the American people, and when that was addressed to them, he never indulged a fear for the result. Mr. S. glanced at the opposition of this measure as federal, and monopolizing in its tendency, and showed that the Federal party had, for the last forty years, been denouncing the Democracy of the country as calculated to ruin and degrade it. Notwithstanding all these denunciations, these fearful prophecies, said Mr. S. the nation has grown in a manner unparalleled in history—while this party was always contending that the people were unfit to govern themselves, and would ruin the Republic, yet, from the old thirteen, the Republic had increased to twenty-six States. This party was always for the benefit of the people, it never considered itself, in any measure it recommended—oh no!—"the people, the dear people," were their only consideration. When our hardy and gallant seamen were impressed and torn from their families and friends, this party said never mind this poor set of miserable devils; would you endanger our property for the sake of such creatures? Yes, said Mr. S. these very miserable creatures, who afterwards won imperishable glory under the flag of their country, were not worthy of consideration in their eyes; but would have been left to pine out their lives in slavery and chains on board of foreign ships, had not the Democracy of the nation determined that the meanest of our citizens should not be subjected to ignominy or oppression. Then followed the embargo, when this same Federal party contended it was better to let the British take our ships than they should be permitted to rot at the wharves. Look to the war that ensued, when the country was bleeding at every pore, where was this Federal party then? Why denouncing their own Government, and declaring it to be wicked and immoral to celebrate our victories. Notwithstanding all this, the Democracy triumphed—the nation triumphed. The election of Gen. Jackson, and the present President, were alike causes, in their opinion, for the overthrow of the Republic, but it had then gone on to triumph, and would go on, and this very measure before them, which was much more loudly denounced than all others, would, also, be the means of enhancing the true health and happiness of the nation. Mr. S. went on until a late hour, showing the danger of encouraging moneyed monopolies, in a Government like ours, and the hazardous situation in which the Government might be placed, in trusting its funds to their keeping. (Mr. S's speech was able and argumentative, and, as soon as it can be written out, will appear in the columns of this paper.)

On motion

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 15, 1838.

CHOCTAW TREATY.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the House took up the following Senate bill, on its third reading, which had been postponed on Friday last, viz:

"An act to amend an act entitled an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of lands, under the 14th article of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians in 1830."

The bill had been reported from the Indian Committee without amendment.

Mr. DAWSON moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, stating that he wished to amend it.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio hoped the gentleman would name some other than a private business day.

Mr. BELL thought it better to suffer the bill to pass as it came from the Senate, as it would probably have the effect of spurring on the commissioners; and the time might afterwards be extended, if it was found necessary. He had no objection, however, to such an amendment as to exclude those Indians who had emigrated west of the Mississippi prior to the first of January, 1834.

Mr. B. then proposed an amendment to that effect.

Mr. DAWSON said this amendment did not remove his objection to the bill.

Mr. BELL went into an explanation of the provisions of the treaty and the effect of the amendment, which would prevent any of the frauds alleged to have been attempted by bringing the western Indians back, and the purchase of their pretended claims by speculators.

Mr. DAWSON said it had been over and over again asserted that many of those Indians had come back for the very purpose of making claims, which claims had been bought up by combinations of speculators.

Mr. BELL admitted there might be some who went on their own account, at their private expense, and not under the conduct of an officer of the Government, and under such circumstances it was a question if these would not be entitled to benefit.

Mr. PARKER suggested a modification, to make the amendment general in its application, so as to apply to all who emigrated prior to the time stated. This, he thought, would remove the objection of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BELL accepted this modification.

Mr. HAYNES would put it to the gentleman from Tennessee, whether if the treaty secured to the Choctaw Indians certain reservations, on certain conditions, one of which was, that they should remain in five years, but had emigrated subsequently, they could be deprived of their rights to reservations under the fourteenth article of the treaty by any action of ours. He would not move to amend the amendment, but he would submit it to the gentleman from Tennessee, whether cases might not arise where this provision might act to the prejudice of these persons.

Mr. BELL said, if there should exist any evidence of a case alluded to by the gentleman, though he knew of none, Congress would cheerfully grant relief. There was, however, no reason to believe that any such case existed, and not the slightest evidence of one had been exhibited.

Mr. OWENS did not doubt but that this bill was called for on the grounds stated by Mr. BELL the other day, but there was one provision of which he did not see the necessity. It was that authorizing the Commissioners to change their location or place of setting.

Mr. PARKER explained the object of that provision to be, to save a great expense to the country, in consequence of a large number of the witnesses having removed to distant points.

Mr. LYON gave an additional reason. Many of the persons entitled to reservations, being according to the number of their children, viz: half a section for each child under ten years of age, and a quarter section for each child under that age, had removed since the session, and the Commissioners, deeming it necessary that the children should be produced, this provision had been inserted to prevent the great inconvenience that would have resulted to the claimants themselves.

Mr. OWENS expressed himself satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. DAWSON stated the grounds of his opposition to this bill, under which the greatest frauds would be perpetrated. They were substantially as follows:

It would involve the Government in an expense of some ten or fifteen millions of dollars to get itself out of the very difficulty in which this law would place it; and he would prove—

First, that the census taken by Mr. Armstrong, the agent of this Government, showed that there were about 19,669 Choctaw Indians residing in the States of Mississippi and Alabama, and that 15,000 of these had been removed at the expense of the Government.

Next, that the agents of the General Government stated that there were only eighty-one Indians entitled, under that 14th article of the treaty, to the reservation contemplated by it.

He would then show that another gentleman who had been appointed, carried out the number to 572 Indians.

Further: he would show, from documents furnished by the Legislature of Mississippi, and the Indian Department at Washington, that there were now about 10,000 Choctaws in Mississippi, who claimed the right to reservations under the 14th article, notwithstanding that 15,000 had emigrated.

And he would show that, on the 22d of January, 1836, so well convinced was General Jackson that the grossest frauds were about to be practised on the Government, to an extent probably never known before in the history of this Government, he put an end to the whole proceedings, and withdrew the power from the agents to proceed any further therein.

On these heads Mr. D. dwelt at some length, and went into a detailed examination and review of the documents necessary to sustain those positions.

Before Mr. D. has concluded,

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day, when the vote was—ayes 39, noes 47, no quorum.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it was evident that it would be very difficult to procure a quorum to-day on account of the interest felt at the other end of the Capitol, [it was understood that Mr. CALHOUN was was speaking on the Independent Treasury bill,] and he therefore moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 6, nays 136.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CAMBLELENG said he knew the importance of the bill called up by the gentleman from Tennessee, and he (Mr. C.) wished it to pass; but at the same time he wished to state to the House that every branch of the public service was suffering from the want of the action of the House on the appropriation bills. He would, however, withdraw the motion to proceed to the orders of the day, with the hope that the bill under consideration would be promptly disposed of.

Mr. FAIRFIELD renewed the motion to proceed to the orders of the day; but the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. DAWSON then concluded his remarks.

Mr. BELL made a brief reply, and stated that every objection urged by the gentleman had been fully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, two years ago, had instructed Mr. B. to make a full report on the subject.

Mr. PARKER considered the remarks of the gentleman from Gergia, (Mr. DAWSON,) as more of an attack upon the policy which had been pursued by the Government towards the Indians, than as opposing this bill. He considered the bill now under consideration as one of importance, and one which ought to pass. The treaty had provided that reservations should be made, and it became necessary that an investigation should be had to see who were entitled to those reservations. A law had passed Congress at a former session, instituting a commission to make the examination, but in consequence of difficulties which had arisen in relation to this commission, by the resignation of one of the commissioners, and from other causes, the duties the commissioners had imposed upon them were not completed, and the time was now about to expire; and in consequence of this, there was a great necessity for its adoption. Mr. P. explaied the whole object of the commission, and replied briefly to the arguments of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRARY was opposed to extending this commission in committee, and was still opposed to its passage. In the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, there was a provision that the claims of Indians should be presented within six months, and in that six months he believed nearly all the claims were presented that this Government ought to allow. By admitting claims, as we were now about to do, he contended that it would be introducing corruption among the Indians, because it would be holding out an inducement to every Indian in Mississippi a claimant, and every one a witness in relation to claims. An Indian will say to his neighbor, "If you will be a witness in my case, I will be a witness in your claim;" and, in this way, fraud will be committed on the Government of the United States; it will have to give back half the lands to the Indians which it has bought from them.

Mr. C. moved to amend the amendment by inserting in it the following: "Nor in relation to any claim not presented to the locating agent prior to the first Monday in December, 1835."

Mr. BELL briefly opposed the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, because, in some cases, injustice might be done to those Indians.

Mr. LYONS should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, as well as of the gentleman from Tennessee. He considered that the better plan would be to allow each of those individuals to present his claim here, like all other claimants, than to give this extensive power to this commission. There was a particular mode pointed out in the treaty in relation to these claims, and he considered that most of them had been presented within the proper time. If, however, any of them had neglected to present their claims within the time specified, he would rather have them presented to the House separately, than to have them examined into in this extended manner by this commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina briefly supported the bill, contending that if we did not allow time to this commission, that injustice might be done to the Indians, and the expense to the United States would be greatly increased; but he was opposed to the amendments moved to the bill by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; and

The amendment of Mr. BELL was then agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved an additional section, to strike from the list of claimants any Indians who should attempt to use or substitute the children of others, for the purpose of increasing their claims, which was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and the amendment having been engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the orders of the day, for the purpose of proceeding with the subject of the northeastern boundary question.

Mr WISE moved that the House adjourn, which was agreed to; and so The House adjourned.

ERRATUM.—In the remarks of Mr GLASCOCK on Monday, on the resolution to raise a Committee of Inquiry in relation to alleged charges of corruption in a member of Congress, our Reporter misunderstood the speaker. He said: "If he was an advocate of Matthew L. Davis and the editors of the New York Enquirer, he would not hesitate in advising a prompt and decisive answer to the question propounded; and he gladly mistook the characters of the editors of that paper, if, from their publication, they would not prefer such a course."

Mr. GLASCOCK was inadvertently represented as opposing Mr. Davis's application, instead of advocating it.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 15th, 1838.

From the Committee on Private Land Claims, an unfavorable report on the petition of John Riley.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported bills for the relief of Hannah Laighton and Lemuel White; which were read and ordered to a second reading.

Also, from the same Committee, unfavorable reports on the petitions of Amasa Brown, Rebecca Hawley and Cephas Carpenter; which were severally concurred in.

Mr. MORRIS asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Wood, and to have referred back to the Committee on Pensions the papers of Samuel Crapin; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to refer the resolution, submitted by him, in relation to keeping certified copies of all petitions and documents on file in the Secretary's office, to the Committee on Claims: agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KING,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate what progress has been made under the appropriations of Congress for 1836 and 1837, for the improvement of the naval arsenal at Pensacola; what is the present condition in regard to facilities afforded for the supply, repairs, and construction of vessels of war, and what measures have been taken for the completion of said naval arsenal on the plan approved by the President; that the Secretary of the Navy be also requested to state the reasons why the sum of $50,000 appropriated for the construction of marine barracks at the Pensacola arsenal, has not been applied to that object.

On motion of Mr. KNIGHT,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing further compensation to the collecter of the customs for the District of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what further legislation is necessary to give effect to the act of Congress of June 30, 1834, making a grant of land to certain Polish exiles.

Mr. YOUNG called up the following resolution submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate, detailed statements of the accounts of such of the Collectors and Receivers of Public Moneys, as have been reported defaulters to either House of Congress during the present session; including in each case all superseded and rejected items of credit, connected with any such account, and which, if passed to the credit of any such defaulter, would cover or extinguish, in the whole or in part, the amount of the deficits which are reported as standing on the books of the Department, against any such defaulter, with suitable explanations in each case, showing why such items have been suspended or rejected, and why they ought not to be allowed as credits to such defaulters. The said report to include all such suspended or rejected items of credit as are remaining in the said department, up to the present period.

Mr. YOUNG explained the object he had view in offering the resolution. He said that many persons had been improperly reported as defaulters, who were not so; his object was that the proper distinction should be drawn in these statements, that Congress and the people might know, at a single glance, who were and who were not defaulters, and the reputation of public officers saved from injurious aspersions.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TIPTON said on yesterday he gave notice of a motion for leave to introduce a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the stock owned by the United States in the Louisville and Portland canal, and for the investment of the proceeds of the sales of the stock in stock of the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company. The Jeffersonville and New Albany Company was incorporated by the General Assembly of Indiana. That Company at this time stands in need of the aid of the General Government. The Louisville and Portland canal is completed. The stock owned by the United States in that canal is about $300,000. It is profitable stock, yielding from 13 to 18 per cent. profit per annum. He was informed for several years past this large profit was made on the United States stock in that canal, by levying most enormous and oppressive tolls on the commerce of the Ohio river, above the falls. He did not think it is the policy of this Government to stand by and become toll-gatherers from the people of one portion of the United States, for the benefit of another. All that he now asked was to sell out the stock on the Kentucky side, and invest it in similar stock on the Indiana side, where we will certainly construct a larger and safer canal, for the passage of steam and other boats. The construction of the canal on the Indiana side would reduce the tolls to navigators, and cheapen the transportation of the produce raised and exported from the Ohio river above the falls. As soon as the canal was finished on the Indiana side, he would have no objection to selling out that stock, and investing the proceeds in similar works in some other quarter.

The bill was read twice and referred.

The bills for changing the time of holding the Circuit Courts of the United States in the ninth judicial district, and that supplementary to an act relating to the District of Columbia, (appointing an additional judge for the Orphans' Court,) were severally read a third time and passed.

The following bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

Bill for the relief of Daniel Steinrod.

Bill for the relief of certain citizens of Arkansas.

Also, the bill making appropriations for the completion of certain military roads in Arkansas.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill imposing additional duties as depositaries on certain public officers, etc. The question being on Mr. RIVES's amendment—

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate in a speech of great power, and more than usual animation, which will be given in extenso hereafter.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Feb. 16, 1838.

NORTHERN FRONTIER.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. HOWARD rose and stated that he had received last night a communication from the Secretary of War, enclosing some papers, which satisfied him that it was his duty, this morning, to move the House to suspend its rule, in order to take up the bill now on the table for the preservation of peace on our frontier. With the leave of the House, and to show them the grounds upon which he based his motion, which were not those of expediency, but of absolute necessity, in order to support not only the military, but also the civil power, he proposed to have the papers read, and after that he thought the House would acquiesce in the opinion that the other business must necessarily yield to this. The purport of them, in a word, was to show that an expedition was preparing on the south side of Lake Erie to invade Canada, and the information rested upon the authority of an eye witness, a naval officer, who saw the assemblage, their collection of arms, and saw them in march. The information was of such a character as satisfied Mr. H. that it was necessary to have upon it the action of that House. He would send the papers to the table to be read to the House.

Mr. HARLAN wished the committees to be allowed first to make their reports.

Mr. HOWARD was sorry the gentleman had interposed an objection, for though he was willing that the House might take any time in the day they chose, yet he did think, if it was aware of the importance of the step he asked them to take, they would take it at once. He hoped, at least, the gentleman would withdraw his objection to the reading of the papers.

Mr. HARLAN withdrawing his objection, the papers were read at the Clerk's table, and are as follows:

HEAD QUARTERS. NIAGARA FRONTIER,
Buffalo, Feb. 9, 1838.

GENERAL: Captain Homans, of the Navy, arrived here last night from Detroit, in four and a half days. The information he brings is important and perplexing. The enclosed copy of a despatch, wrote and mailed en route, to General Brady, gives its general character. He adds, that in passing through the Black Swamp, he walked several miles in company with Lieutenant Ottinger, of the revenue service, and conversed with individuals of each straggling party, all of whom concurred in representing the force to be about 800 men. Individuals who joined the stage at lower points, carry the number still higher, the whole under the command of Mr. McCloud, Mr. Van Rensselaer's Adjutant General, stated to be a man of much energy. The latter individual left this place last evening to join these forces. Information on which I rely, represents Mr. Van Rensselaer as sanguine of making a forward movement at the head of 300 or 400 men. The point selected is probably on the St. Clair river, and the campaign to open near old Fort Sinclair, operating in the direction of Lake Simcoe. Relying upon the general accuracy of the information, viz: that there is a strong rally of the hostile force, that their direction is through Michigan, probably, or Detroit, that the quiet which happily prevails in this immediate vicinity enabled me to detach a portion of the force, and that every regular bayonet is of importance to General Brady, I have deemed it my duty to put Major Young's command in motion for Detroit, for which place sixty men, under the command of Captain Johnston, accompanied by Lieut. Thornton, Acting Assistant Quartermaster, and Assistant Surgeon Fellows, will leave in stages at five o'clock, p. m. and will reach Detroit in six, perhaps four days, a contract to that effect having been made with the stage proprietor. I am aware of the responsibility I assumed in adopting this measure, which I trust may be acceptable to you. The theatre of action is immediately transferred from this region, at least for the present. Nevertheless, I hope you may consider it expedient to push to this point all the disposable force (recruits) now at New York, and intermediate points. You are aware of the nakedness of the command in respect to officers.

Capt. Homans further says, that he examined sufficiently to satisfy himself that the wagons referred to in his letter to General Brady actually contained arms and ammunition. The people on the route have freely given their arms to this lawless band, supplied all their necessities, and recruits are joining them from all quarters. I have considered these matters of sufficient importance to justify me in sending an officer by the stage of this evening, to increase the chances of overtaking you at Albany. He also carries a copy, in case you should have left, to be mailed for New York, and a third for Washington, to your address, under cover to the Adjutant General.

I have &c. &c.

W. J. WORTH, Lt. Col. Commanding.

To Maj. Gen. Sc , &c. Albany.

MILAN, HURON COUNTY, OHIO, 5th Feb. 1838.

GENERAL: I feel it my duty to acquaint you, that on my journey to-day between Perrysburg and this place, we have passed several detachments of men, calling themselves Patriots, numbering probably about 250. They generally agreed, on conversing with them, that there were 800 of them scattered on the road, and 500 Indians of the Cattaraugus tribe, all destined to rendezvous at some place near Detroit most favorable to effect a landing in Canada. We also passed during the day about 20 loaded wagons, half that number boxed up, purposely to resemble pedlars' wagons, but containing their arms and accoutrements; the other wagons containing powder, and other munitions, put up in pork barrels, and other deceptive cases. These men had with them drums, fifes, bugles, and other instruments of music. The Indians we did not see, as they, with other bands of the Patriots, were said to have taken the lake road through Sandusky city. All we spoke with were positive of there being from 1300 to 1500 men in all, and daily augmenting their numbers by volunteers from the towns and villages through which they passed, but I question their being over 400 or 500. General Van Rensselaer was expected to join them; also McKenzie. Judging from their train of wagons, I should judge they had a large materiel with them.

I remain, sir, with high consideration,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES T. HOMANS, Lt. U. S. N.

Brig. Gen. HUGH BRADY, Commanding
United States forces, Detroit.

Mr. HOWARD then expressed a hope that the gentleman would withdraw his objection. He merely recalled the attention of the House to the fact, that the protection of our frontier and the preservation of our neutral relations, were now entirely thrown upon the military arm instead of the civil, and it was so, because there was no existing law to meet the case. Mr. H's object was to pass a law that would bring the interposition of the civil law into force.

The objection being withdrawn, the bill was accordingly taken up on its third reading.

The bill, as it came from the Senate, was as follows:

AN ACT to amend an act entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved twentieth April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and inspectors of the customs, the marshals and deputy marshals, of the United States, and every other person who may be specially empowered for the purpose by the President of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, respectively, authorized and required to seize every vessel or vehicle belonging to any citizen or citizens of the United States, and about to pass the frontier of the same, for any place within any foreign State or colony conterminous with the United States, when the circumstances of the case shall render it probable that such vessel or vehicle is intended to be employed in carrying on hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of any such conterminous State or colony with whom the United States are at peace; or in giving aid and comfort to the persons carrying on such hostilities, by conveying to their assistance men, arms, or munitions of war; and to detain every such vessel or vehicle, and all arms and munitions of war which may be found therein, until the owner or owners thereof shall enter into bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in double the value of the said vessel or vehicle, and of the arms and munitions of war found therein, that the said vessel or vehicle, and the said arms and munitions of war, shall not be employed by such owner or owners, nor by any other person, with his or their consent or knowledge, in carrying on or aiding such hostilities as above mentioned; or until the President of the United States shall direct the restoration of the vessel, vehicle, or property so seized.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several officers and persons in the preceding section mentioned shall be, and they are hereby, also authorized and required to seize all arms and munitions of war belonging to any citizen or citizens of the United States, and about to be carried across the frontier of the United States, when the circumstances of the case shall render it probable that the same are intended to be sent to any place within any foreign State or colony conterminous with the United States, and with whom the United States are at peace, for the purpose of being used in carrying on hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of such conterminous state or colony; and to detain the arms and munitions of war so seized, until the owner or owners thereof shall enter into bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in double the value of the said arms and munitions of war, that the same shall not be employed by such owner or owners, nor by any other person, with his or their consent or knowledge, in carrying on or aiding such hostilities as above mentioned, or until the President of the United States shall direct the restoration of the same: Provided, That nothing in this or the preceding section contained, shall be construed to extend to or interfere with any trade in arms or munitions of war, conducted in vessels by sea, with any foreign port or place whatsoever, which might have been lawfully carried on by citizens of the United States before the passage of this act, under the provisions of the act hereby amended.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any body of armed men, who have been actually engaged in carrying on hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of any foreign state or colony, conterminous with the United States, and with whom they are at peace, shall come within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whilst such hostilities are pending, it shall be the duty of the several officers and persons hereinbefore mentioned, and they are hereby respectively authorized and required, to seize and take from any such body of armed men, all weapons and arms brought by them within the United States, and to detain the same until the respective owners thereof shall enter into bond to the United States, with sufficient sureties, in double the value of the said weapons and arms, that the same shall not be employed by such owner or owners, nor by any other person, with his or their consent or knowledge, in carrying on or aiding such hostilities, as before mentioned; or until the President of the United States shall direct the restoration of the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person apprehended and committed for trial, for any offence against the act hereby amended, shall, when admitted to bail for his appearance, give such additional security, as the judge admitting him to bail may require, not to violate, nor to aid in violating, any of the provisions of the act hereby amended.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the President of the United States shall have reason to believe that offences have been, or are likely to be, committed against the provisions of the act hereby amended, within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney, of such district, to attend at such place within the district, and for such time, as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy and convenient arrest and examination of persons charged with the violation of the act hereby amended; and it shall be the duty of every such judge, or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place, and for the time therein designated.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and to enforce the due execution, of this act and the act hereby amended."

The Committee on Foreign Affairs had reported it back to the House with the following proposed amendment: Insert, after the word "whatsoever," near the end of the second section, the following: "other than ports or places within such conterminous State or colony."

The question was on concurring in this amendment.

Mr. HOWARD explained the principles of the bill and the amendment proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which amendment he himself did not feel very solicitous about. When the Message of the President was referred to the committee, it took it up and examined the subject carefully, and went fully into an investigation of all the various topics connected with our neutral relations with other Governments. The great object which the committee kept in view was to provide the means of executing our duties towards other countries, without interfering with what had in this country always been considered a legal and justifiable trade between the citizens of this and of a foreign country, and it was the consideration of this point which had caused much delay and difficulty in the committee. When two nations are engaged in war, the right of the merchants of this country to furnish either party with provisions and munitions, had always been claimed and exercised, and there was no disposition in the committee to infringe this right. The object of the committee was to have this right remain upon the same footing on which it formerly stood; but at the same time our Government was bound to prevent our citizens from interfering in the affairs of a neighboring Government, for the purpose of stirring up insurrection—of keeping up a civil war. If this was permitted to be done, the war might be rolled back upon us, and we would suffer for the indiscretion of a few of our citizens.

There is now a danger of our neutrality being violated, and the whole protection of that neutrality was thrown upon the military authority of the United States, and the officers who have charge of that duty are executing it under the act of Congress which this act proposes to amend. A high military officer now had charge of this delicate trust, and the object of this bill was to give the civil authority cognizance of the matter, or at least to bring it to the aid of the military power, which would make it much more effective. With this view this bill had been reported to the House, and he hoped it would be speedily acted upon.

Mr. HOLSEY must confess that he was not altogether satisfied with the provisions of this bill. He thought we ought to pause before we made any fundamental alteration in those principles in relation to our export trade, which had existed since the foundations of our Government. He considered that our citizens had a perfect right to carry on a trade with either of the belligerent parties in a neighboring Government, where a foreign war existed, without affecting the neutrality of the Government; and he would be sorry to see any restrictions imposed upon this just and proper trade, such as he feared this bill would impose. The proper provision to make on this subject, would be to prevent our citizens from interfering personally in a dispute in a neighboring Government; but this bill went far beyond that, and put it in the power of this Government, or the officers of the Government, to seize any vessels having on board arms, or any other things which it was supposed it was conveying into a neighboring territory, for the purpose of being used there for carrying on the war. For one, he was not disposed to go this far in placing it in the hands of the Government, or the officers of the Government, to use this discretionary power to the prejudice of the citizen, or the seizure of the property of the citizen. Our citizens, he maintained, had a perfect right to trade with either of the contending parties to a war which might be going on on the continent of Europe, without compromitting the neutrality of the United States; and he would not now consent, by his vote, to have such restrictions as were proposed by this bill imposed on the citizens of this country. The framers of our Constitution had guarded our export trade so that no restrictions should be imposed upon it in the shape of a tax; and why should we in this manner attempt to place restrictions upon it, in contravention of the spirit of the Constitution, if not of the letter of it. He considered this bill of a character calculated to do great injustice to the people of this country; and he called upon the House to pause and reflect, before it acted upon it.

Mr. LOOMIS, of New York, had risen reluctantly to propose an amendment to the bill under consideration. He would propose a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIR remarked that it was not at that time in order to propose an amendment, as that reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was now pending.

Mr. LOOMIS said that he should offer it when in order. In the mean time, he would briefly submit his views upon the bill, as it stood before the House. He was not opposed to the principle which seemed to lie at the foundation of the bill. One of the very highest duties of the Government was to prevent the unlawful interference by our citizens with the quarrels of countries with whom the Government is at peace; and it was equally the duty of the citizens to refrain from such interference. In this principle, and in its general application, therefore, he fully agreed with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. But he could not consent to go for the measure in the form in which it had been proposed by that gentleman.

Mr. LOOMIS reviewed the circumstances connected with the recent disturbances upon the Canada frontier, and contended that they were of a peculiar character. There was a long line of frontier, separating the two countries from each other, yet placing so narrow a barrier between them as to render it impossible that local disturbances breaking out on one side of that line should not spread to the other. The inhabitants of the American side were peculiarly sensitive on this point. Their native love of liberty, and deep-rooted hatred of tyranny, were inflamed, very naturally, whenever an appeal was made to those noble principles. Thus it happened that they were very easily led to take a deep interest, if not an active part, in those struggles. Abstractedly taken, he would do nothing to check or to discourage that holy principle, or to extinguish the bright spark of liberty which burns in the heart of every true American citizen. Yet something, he must remember, was due to national right and national obligation; and for the preservation of these, too, he would do every thing possible; but he insisted upon it that that should be according to the well-established principles of law.

He deemed the bill inefficient to answer the end it professes to reach. What did it propose to do? To give to United States marshals, deputy marshals, and other officers, power to seize, without process of law or any other limitation than their own individual discretion, any vessel, or vehicle, suspected of being used for the purpose of bearing arms or munitions of war into the conterminous country, to aid in its civil contests, and to detain them until satisfactory surety should be given that they should not be used. Suppose the officer in whom this extraordinary power was vested, to have exercised his discretion, and, in excution of this power, to have seized the property of a citizen: what does the latter do? The bonds are fixed; it may be assumed, fairly fixed; the surety is found, and the party proceeds on his way over the line, into the adjoining country, in the very face and eyes of the officers of Government. Who is to prevent this? Nothing in this law gives any power of prevention to any body. What becomes of the bond? It is in the hands of one of these officers; perhaps it may, by good fortune, have been put into the hands of a district attorney. How is he to know whether the obligation has been violated—the bond broken? How is he to prove that these arms or munitions of war, or whatever else had been seized and given up upon the bond, have been used in the manner designated? Does his jurisdiction extend to the only place where these facts can be ascertained—beyond the line?

There is another objection to the bill. It vests dangerous and unusual powers in the officers of Government. This feature was one which stamped the bill as unconstitutional, and against the whole policy of our laws. It gives to the Executive vast discretionary powers, unparalleled by any ever proposed before to be vested in that branch of the Government. The officer is not only empowered to seize, but to hold, the articles designated. Who is to judge of their value? For it is upon an estimate of their value that the terms of the bond are to be predicated. The same individual who seizes them! And he may fix that value at nothing, so as to expedite the passage of the person whose property has been seized out of the country; or he may make it so exorbitant as to be oppressive, and to amount to a forfeiture of the whole. What was to prevent any one of these officers from stopping a citizen riding in his carriage upon that frontier—ay, in this very city! and saying, "I arrest this carriage as a vehicle contemplated by this bill?" The presumption is, that the officer will do but his simple duty; but the law throws a strong temptation in the way of the officer to do otherwise.

But this bill proposes not only a violation of private rights, but a gross violation of the Constitution. By it any officer may seize the arms of another, at discretion; and this in derogation of a right expressly guaranteed to the citizen by the letter of the Constitution.

Again, the Constitution guaranties to the citizen perfect freedom from arrest without due process of law. [See the fourth amendment of the Constitution.] And this bill proposes to vest arbitrary power in the hands of United States officers to violate this sacred right, also. For, are not the seizure and detaining of arms, and the holding them over to give bonds for their use, violations of the most manifest character of these rights. It could not be doubted.

By this bill, moreover, there was no liability of the officer, in case of wrong seizure or detention, as in all acts upon the statute book, in similar cases.

The only true way, Mr. L. contended, to accomplish the objects of the bill, was to pursue precisely the same mode as that taken in other cases; as in that of arrests of persons, with their instruments and implements, suspected of intending to utter counterfeit money. The presence of the instruments proves the intention, though the act is not proved, and the statute imposes the penalty accordingly. But here, in this bill, the presence of the arms or munitions of war, or whatever else may be seized, does not prove an intention to commit a violation of any law, nor is it made unlawful for the citizen to do that, for the imputed intention of doing which he is held to give bonds, and to have his person and property seized and detained. The bill is thus wanting in the first great principle of all penal acts. If the thing intended to be done be unlawful, the act should declare it, with a proper penalty affixed. It should declare (in order to carry out the recommendation of the President of the United States in relation to this subject) that such use of arms was unlawful, and that the person detained had arms, etc. with intention to use them unlawfully, and the person, being arrested on that ground, would be arrested by a good legal process; and, what is more important, there would then be impending over him the personal fear of seizure to deter him from taking the overt step.

Mr. L. found still more to which to object in the third section of the bill. That section made it the duty of all those officers, designated in the first section, to seize the arms of any body of men who have been engaged in aid of a country with whom this Government was upon friendly footing. He supposed a case, to illustrate the application of this section. Suppose, said he, a war should occur between England and another nation; a national ship of the latter should put into the port of New York; in that ship is a body of armed men, (in the language of this act.) Suppose Russia to be at war with England, and this a Russian national vessel, this Government is certainly bound, by the laws of nations, to protect that vessel, and the rights of her owners, while upon neutral ground. Yet this law would make it the duty of the custom-house officers of that port to seize that vessel, and to hold her and all on board, till bond should be given in accordance with the requisitions of the third section of the bill.

The bill lacks the one great principle of all penal laws: the cause of the seizure of property which the bill proposes should be first made a penal offence, before the seizure under it can be constitutional.

Mr. L. regretted to have felt himself obliged to occupy the time of the House upon this subject; but he could not suffer a measure so important to pass without offering the views which he had expressed.

Mr. SHIELDS considered that it was impossible for the House to act upon this subject advised to-day. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Tuesday next, and make it the special order of the day for that day.

Mr. FILLMORE believed that this bill contained provisions which ought to be discussed deliberately in committee, and not acted upon hastily. He therefore moved to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped that the House would make no more special orders, as gentlemen must have seen the bad effects of special orders heretofore. From the disposition manifested, he expected this bill would be discussed pretty generally; and he should be sorry to see it thrown in the way of the appropriation bills, by making it the special order for Tuesday. The public service was now suffering in almost every branch, for the want of the passage of those bills; and he anticipated from the rule, which prevented any new appropriation from going into the regular appropriation bills, that those bills would be passed with but little discussion, when they were once reached.

Mr. FILLMORE modified his motion, so as to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union simply.

Mr. HOWARD was at a loss to conceive why this bill could not undergo as free and as full a discussion in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Gentlemen could not complain, with any reason, that the bill had been hastily taken up, for two weeks ago he had given notice that he would call it up as soon as certain measures then pending should be disposed of.

Mr. SHIELDS withdrew his motion to postpone, and that of Mr. FILLMORE, to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then recurred.

Mr. HOLSEY moved its recommitment to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but the first motion took precedence.

Mr WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, thought the bill should be discussed fully, either in the House, or in Committee of the Whole. He was indifferent as to which. When, on another occasion, the House had this subject brought before them, they suspended all other business, and attended exclusively to the discussion of this topic. Now there was more danger, he thought, of serious results, than before; and he verily believed that, unless it were speedily attended to, it would be impossible for this Government to keep out of a war with Great Britain another month. He had hoped that other business might have been attended to to-day, being one of the days usually devoted to private business; but he was so impressed with the superior importance of this subject, that he could not but hope that the House would determine to sit until the bill was passed. [Cries of "Agreed! Agreed!"]

Mr. SMITH coincided in this opinion. He held this measure, however, to be one of the most odious, one of the most execrable propositions ever brought before the Congress of the United States to disarm its citizens; and he was convinced that, in its present form, it would not pass.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to his colleague to withdraw his motion.

Mr. FILLMORE did so.

Mr. SHIELDS then moved to postpone the bill till Tuesday next.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said if that motion prevailed the bill would not be reached again for a month to come, and he thought it better for the discussion to progress to-day.

Mr. HAYNES could not, for a moment, doubt that the mind of every member was made up upon all the important principles embraced in this bill. He meant this remark to apply to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. SHIELDS,) for he hoped no member supposed he meant that they should vote upon a question of such consequence without considering it. But it did appear to him that they were as ready to go into the consideration of it then as next Tuesday, or any other reasonable time they might wish to postpone it to. The necessity of adopting some measure for the preservation of the peace of the country must suggest itself to every mind, and he, therefore, hoped the motion to postpone would be rejected.

Mr. McKIM said as he considered this a very important measure, he should ask for the yeas and nays; but subsequently withdrew the call.

Mr. HOLSEY wished the bill recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions so to amend it as alone to provide against any interference by the citizens of the United States in a popular commotion for sedition against any foreign nation with which the United States may be at peace.

The question to postpone was then taken, and disagreed to; and that to concur in the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs then recurring,

The CHAIR suggested that, if it was desired to discuss the bill, it would be better to take the vote thereon, one way or the other, as the amendment did not open the merits of the measure.

The House assented to the suggestion, took the question, and agreed to the amendment.

Mr. FILLMORE then went on to give his reasons at length against this bill, and was followed on the same side by Mr. SMITH of Maine.

Mr LOOMIS then moved the following substitute for the whole bill, and went into a detailed explanation of its provisions as contrasted with the original bill:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as follows:

That no person, being a citizen or a resident of the United States, shall build, fit out, purchase, or procure any vessel or vehicle, or purchase, procure, or collect any arms or munitions of war, within the United States, with intent to have the same taken out of the United States, to be used or employed in carrying on, or in aiding to carry on, hostilities against any foreign state or colony conterminous with the United States, and with which the United States are at peace, or against the Government, the citizens, or property of any such colony or state. And every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not exceeding three years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, Whenever it shall be made to appear by proof, by oath, or affidavit stating the facts and circumstances, satisfactory to any judge of any United States court, or to any special commissioner to be appointed by the President pursuant to this act, that there is good cause to suspect that any one or more persons, being a citizen or resident of the United States, has been guilty of a violation of the preceding section, the said judge or commissioner shall issue his warrant, directed to any marshal, deputy marshal, collector, or inspector of customs, requiring them to arrest such suspected person, and also to seize all such vessels, vehicles, arms, or munitions of war, as shall belong to such suspected person, or be found in his possession, custody, or control. And every such officer to whom such warrant shall be directed or delivered, shall thereby be vested with all the powers necessary to execute the same which are by law vested in the marshals of the United States for execution of any other process.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officer to whom such process shall be directed, and any other such officers whose aid he may require, shall proceed to execute such warrant, and, in case he shall make an arrest thereon, or shall seize any property thereon, or both, shall immediately make return of such process, with his certificate of such execution thereof, to the judge or commissioner who issued the same, or to any other judge or commissioner residing near to the place of such execution. And any person so arrested may be let to bail in like manner, and by such judge or commissioner, or other officer having authority, as in other cases of criminal prosecution on behalf of the United States, and for want of sufficient bail may be held under arrest or imprisoned, as in other cases. And, in case any seizure of property shall be made under such process, such officer shall forthwith make a true inventory thereof, and cause the same to be appraised by two disinterested citizens, upon oath, to be selected and sworn by such officer, and shall return a copy of such inventory and appraisement to the judge or commissioner who issued such warrant, and shall retain such property until the owner or owners thereof shall, with at least two sufficient sureties, enter into bonds to the United States, with a penalty of double the appraised value of such property, conditioned that such property, nor any part thereof, shall be taken out of the United States, to be used for any of the purposes prohibited in the first section of this act, or until the President of the United States shall direct the restoration of such property.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the judge or commissioner who shall issue any warrant under the second section of this act, shall immediately notify the district attorney of the United States for the district in which such warrant shall be issued, who shall thereupon take charge of the matter in behalf of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to require the temporary attendance of any United States district judge at or near any frontier in his district, and also to appoint so many special commissioners to execute the duties required by this act, whenever circumstances render it probable that any violation of this act may be attempted on such frontier; and such special commissioners shall hold such office as long as such exigency shall exist, or until notified by the President of the discontinuance of their commissions. And the several officers of whom duties are herein required shall receive such reasonable compensation for any such services as the President shall determine; and the President may authorize rewards to be offered by any marshal of any district of the United States, not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars in any case, for information which shall lead to the apprehension and conviction of any person who shall violate the first section of this act.

The debate was further continued by Mr. FLETCHER of Massachusetts, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR said it was obvious, that more time was required for gentlemen to prepare themselves to discuss this bill, and he, therefore, moved a postpone its further consideration till Tuesday next, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. HOWARD then replied to the objections of Mr. SMITH, and went into a full exposition of the provisions of the bill, and on examination of Mr. LOOMIS's supplement, which he contended to be more obnoxious to the objections urged against the bill than the bill itself.

Mr. HOLSEY admitted that the explanations of Mr. HOWARD had removed many of his objections. He still had one to a part of the proviso, and moved to strike therefrom the words "conducted in vessels by sea," which would leave the trade equally open by land or sea, and he could perceive no good reason for the distinction.

Mr. SHEPARD supported the bill.

Mr. MASON of Ohio said it was evident that it was not possible that the question would be taken that evening, and he therefore moved an adjournment; but withdrew it at the request of

Mr. THOMPSON, who read the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and said he wished the bill committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order to introduce some provision to protect the rights of the citizens under that clause. Mr. T. then renewed the motion to adjourn, which prevailed, and

The House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The amendments were concurred in.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. TIPTON spoke at considerable length, in opposition to the bill, as more objectionable than a State bank system, and still less to be preferred to a National Bank.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, then rose, and said he was desirous to express his views on this subject, but the state of his health was such at this time as to induce him to ask the Senate, if it was too early to adjourn, to suspend the proceedings on the bill for to-day, and pass to other business.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Senate went into an Executive session. After the doors of the Senate were again opened,

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that on coming into the Senate on Tuesday morning, he found on his desk a letter from one of the members from Maine, which he would now read:

WASHINGTON, TUESDAY MORNING, Feb. 13.

SIR: A friend called at my room last evening, and informed me that it had been ascertained that an article in a New York paper charging one or more members of Congress with some sort of corruption (for I have not seen the article) was a blow aimed at me. Without stopping to inquire in what motive the charge orginated, I feel it a duty I owe myself, as well as the Senate, to request that it cause an inquiry to be made into the matter by committee or otherwise; and may I ask the favor of you to present the subject in such manner as you may deem fit and proper? I am aware that neither our personal or political relations give me any claim on you for this service, and my apology in addressing this note to you is to be found in my desire to avoid even the appearance of seeking immunity in the kindness of personal or political friendships.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER. J. RUGGLES.

Senate, United States.

Having read the letter, Mr. W. said that immediately on receiving it he spoke to the writer, and signified his readiness to present the letter, if the writer thought it necessary; observing that he was not surprised at his anxiety to remove any suspicion or doubt which the charge alluded to might cast on his character or conduct; but that he thought it might be doubtful, until something further should appear, whether the Senate would think it proper to institute any inquiry.

The request, however, having been since repeated, Mr. WEBSTER said he felt it his duty to communicate this letter, in conforming to the wishes of the member, and, in pursuance of the same wishes, he should move a resolution for raising a committee. He wished to say further, that, in making this motion, he must not be understood as pressing himself to institute or carry on any inquiry, or as expressing an opinion upon any part of the subject. What he did was simply to bring the matter in the usual form before the Senate at the request of the party interested; and he desired to add, that if the Senate should be of opinion that a committee ought to be raised, he hoped it would not place his name upon the list of its members, as indispensable engagements would occupy his attention of several days to come.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the subject-matter of the letter of the Hon. JOHN RUGGLES, of the 13th inst. to a member of the Senate, which was laid before the Senate this day."

This resolution lies on the table, by the rules, for one day, and will come up at the next sitting.

Mr. THOMAS said that the Committee on the Judiciary had not formed and did not intend to intimate an opinion as to the inconveniences alleged to have been experienced by the people of Louisiana under the present Circuit Court system. The resolution before the House has been reported at the instance of the members from Louisiana. It was designed to give jurisdiction to the Judiciary Committee over the subject matter complained of, and the committee, if the resolution be adopted, will be prepared to hear and act upon any suggestions that may be made from any quarter pertinent to the question.

Mr. HALEY, the chairman, rose and said, that he was instructed to inform the House, that the committee had had several meetings on the subject generally committed to them, and found that there were six other standing committees, specially charged with the supervision of the expenditures of separate departments. In consequence of this, the committee over which he had the honor to preside, did not deem it expedient to enter on their duties, or rather such duties as might be supposed to be committed to them, until those special committees had reported, and then, if they deemed it necessary, they would enter into a re-examination of such reports. This appeared to be the only duty they could perform.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, the subject was referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. MERCER reported a resolution calling upon the President of the United States for any information he might deem it proper to communicate, respecting the action of the Executive Department, in relation to the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1835, requiring the President of the United States to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with other nations, and especially the Government of Central America, for a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien; which was concurred in.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the neutrality bill, published in a preceding column.

The question pending was on the substitute proposed by Mr. LOOMIS.

Mr. MASON of Ohio, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at considerable length on the subject of the bill generally. He was not opposed to the object which he doubted not the Committee on Foreign Affairs had in view in bringing this bill before the House, but he had objections to many of the provisions of the bill. By the first section of the bill, certain United States officers are authorized to seize all vessels and vehicles which it is thought probable are about to cross the frontier, to be used in carrying on a war against the citizens or subjects of a neighboring State. If, however, gentlemen would examine the language of the first section of the bill in connection with the provision of the following section, they would find, if he was not greatly mistaken, in it, that our citizens were only prevented from supplying arms and munitions of war to the parent State, while they were left free to supply the rebellious individuals who had taken up arms against the mother country. This was his construction of the two sections, and if the committee entertained different views, he should like them to explain.

With regard to the condition of things on our southern border, he should like to know how the provisions of this bill would apply there. He did not apprehend that it would apply to Texas at all, because it provided that the United States officers were only to act when vessels were about to take arms into a neighboring territory for the purpose of being used against the citizens or subjects of said conterminous country. Then, with regard to Texas: the war which might be going on there being all on one side, the whole population of Texas being engaged against the authority of Mexico, he presumed the provisions of this bill would not apply so as to authorize the seizure of any arms about to be taken into that territory by citizens of this country. Practically, then, by the provisions of this bill, we would be prevented from furnishing arms to Mexico, while we would be permitted to furnish Texas with all kinds of munitions of war. This was the way he understood it, but the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs said he was mistaken.

Mr. LEGARE said that, in his view of the matter, this law, if it passed, would not apply to Texas, because it was recognised by our Government to be an independent State.

Mr. MASON supposed, then, that this law was not intended to apply at all to our southwestern frontier.

Mr. LEGARE said he had merely alluded to the Government of Texas and to no other portion of the southwestern frontier.

Mr. MASON presumed there would be a great contrariety of opinion in relation to this matter, in the House. He desired to ascertain what the practical application of this law would be with regard to existing difficulties, and difficulties which might arise hereafter.

Mr. HOWARD rose to explain. He had, on yesterday, attempted to explain the difficulties which presented themselves to the committee, when this bill was before them. There were three gradations through which a nation must pass before it can take its stand as an independent nation. He alluded to a colonial government. The first step was revolt or insurrection. The next was civil war: that is, when an insurrection has become of sufficient magnitude to entitle it to that appellation. And the third and last was, when its independence was recognised by other Governments.

Now the object of this bill was merely to apply to the first of these cases. It was admitted to be a matter of great difficulty to provide in a law in advance, any conditions on which the Executive or Congress should undertake to say precisely when any people passed from the first to the second of these stages. There were certain cases where every body would admit that a people were in the first; and so with the second of these stages; but there might be great doubt as to the particular time when it passed from the one to the other. With regard to the present condition of things in Canada, no body would believe that a civil war was raging there.

It was yet but a revolt, and there was no telling whether it would ever be any thing more. Then, as there was to be discretionary power in relation to this matter placed somewhere, it was deemed by the committee most proper to leave this with the only constitutional power—the Executive power. The committee, therefore, introduced a provision to authorize the Executive to restore property which might be seized, on certain contingencies; for, in case of civil war, our citizens have the right to send arms, and this right they had always maintained; but in the first case—that of revolt—they had not. He would answer the gentleman, then, by saying that it would be competent for the people of this country to avail themselves of their usual right of exporting arms and ammunition to either party, in case they chose to run the risk of confiscation. It is well known that the laws of nations permitted this sort of trade to be carried on without involving the nations whose citizens participate in it in a war. The citizens carried on the trade at the risk of having their property confiscated.

Mr. MASON considered that these provisions of the bill were not calculated to effect the object which it ought to be the intention of every person desirous of preserving the neutrality of this Government. Great Britain and Mexico were now making loud and serious complaints of the interference of our citizens in their affairs, and it was the duty of the Government of the United States to restrain its citizens from intermeddling in the affairs of foreign Governments. Mr. M. proceeded at considerable length to answer the arguments of the gentleman, in relation to these provisions of the bill, and concluded by sending to the Clerk's table, certain amendments which he intended to submit to the first and second sections of the bill, when it would be in order to do so.

Mr. HOWARD then sent to the Clerk's table, and had read, two letters which he had received from the War Department; the one from General Brady, and the other from Governor Mason, setting forth the condition of things on the frontier, and urging the passage of the bill under consideration.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House at some length in support of the bill, but in opposition to some of its provisions. He considered that our citizens had rights in this matter which ought not to be infringed. Our people had a perfect right to trade with the people of Canada, of whatever party they might be, in the articles referred to in the bill, without the Government of Great Britain having any right to take exception to it. There was no treaty between us and Great Britain which would prevent our citizens from carrying on this trade, and it was expressly permitted by the laws of nations; therefore, he was opposed to interfering with it in this wise. He would go against our Government interfering in any way with the affairs of other Governments, but he would not go to place restrictions upon our people which the laws of nations did not require or demand.

Mr. HOLSEY withdrew his motion to strike out a part of the proviso of the original bill, and gave notice of an amendment he should move when it was in order.

Mr. EVERETT, also, gave notice of an amendment he designed to submit, and moved its printing.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that all the amendments be printed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio also moved an amendment to strike out certain parts of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS also gave notice of certain amendments.

Mr. LOOMIS submitted a modification of his substitute.

All the amendments were then ordered to be printed; the bill was laid aside, and sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the bill in relation to the north-eastern boundary was ordered to be printed, and then, on motion,

The House adjourned

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 19, 1838.

The business in regular order, under the new rule, being to call the States and Territories for resolutions,

NEUTRAL LAWS.

Mr. HOWARD moved a suspension thereof, for the purpose of proceeding with the "Neutrality bill."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, as this was a very important question, he would ask for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 93, nays 51.

So the House refused to suspend the rule, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. PATTON, and by general consent, the bill and various amendments were all recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BEATTY, on leave, presented a number of petitions and memorials; which were appropriately referred.

[The petitions presented by Mr. B. were as follows: A petition signed by a large number of citizens of Armstrong county, praying for the establishment of a post route therein mentioned. Also, a remonstrance, signed by a very respectable number of citizens of Butler county, against the annexation of Texas to this Union. Also, joint resolutions of the Pennsylvania Legislature, in favor of a Macadamized road from some point on the National road to the town of Erie. Also, the petition of a large number of the citizens of Western Pennsylvania, praying an appropriation to improve the Alleghany river to Oleant Point, in the State of New York. Also, a petition from Western Pennsylvania, in favor of an appropriation to Elkcreek Harbor, on Lake Erie.]

Mr. CURTIS, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, reported a bill for the relief of certain debtors of the United States, and to repeal certain acts relating thereto; which was committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. FAIRFIELD,

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON,

Resolved. That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Gardiner, in the State of Maine, through Windsor, Patricktown, Washington, Liberty, Appleton, Leasmont and Belmont, to Belfast, and of discontinuing the parts of routes now existing between said points.

On motion of Mr. SMITH,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of law "for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1831, to all cases of the denomination provided for in said act, that has arisen, or shall arise hereafter.

On motion of Mr. EVANS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the construction of the Military road, in the State of Maine, authorized by the joint resolution of Congress, approved March 2, 1829, or with such alterations and variations of the same as public interest and the security of the frontier may require.

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following resolution, which, giving rise to debate, lies over by the rule:

Resolved, That the just claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of the Mexican Republic for indemnity for injuries upon their persons or property committed by officers or other persons subject to the jurisdiction of the Mexican Confederation, ought not to be sacrificed or abandoned by the Government of the United States.

Resolved, That the existing relations between the United States and the Mexican Republic cannot justify the United States, on any principle of international law, in resorting to any measure of hostility against the Mexican Government or people.

Resolved, That in the present state of the relations between these United States and Mexico, nothing has occurred which can justify the continued suspension of amicable negotiations between them.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to resume amicable negotiations with the Government of the Mexican Confederation.

On motion of Mr. BORDEN, ment and the banking institutions, and especially prohibiting the latter from using such public deposites as may be made therein, directly or indirectly, as the basis of discounts or otherwise, for their own benefit, and preventing in future the accumulation of, or, where that cannot be effected, providing for, the speedy reduction of any surplus in the Treasury beyond its reasonable wants.

By Mr. DROMGOOLE:

RESOLUTION proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to the election of President.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution:

"The electors shall meet in their respective States, on such day as Congress shall determine, and vote for President and Vice President, in the manner prescribed by the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution. In addition to the lists required by the said twelfth article of amendments, the electors shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the United States, or, if there is no President, to the person exercising the powers of said office, within days, to be opened and examined by him. If it shall appear, upon examination, that no person has received a majority of the votes of the electors appointed, the President of the United States, or the person exercising the powers of said office, shall forthwith, by proclamation and by notifications to the Executives of each State, publish the number of votes given to each person as President. Whereupon, the said electors, or such others as may be appointed in their stead by each or any of the States, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, shall meet on such day succeeding the first meeting as Congress shall determine, and vote for one of the two persons having the highest numbers on the lists of those voted for as President at the said first meeting. Or if it should happen that more than two persons shall have received the highest, and also equal, numbers of votes, the said electors shall vote for one of them as President. Or if it should happen that one person shall have received the highest number, and not a majority of the whole number of votes, and two or more persons shall have received the next highest, and also equal, numbers of votes, the said electors shall vote either for the person having the highest number, or for one of those having the next highest number of votes as President.

"The electors at the said second meeting, should it take place, shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes given by the electors at their first meeting shall be counted, and also the votes given by the electors at their second meeting, should such second meeting have taken place; if it shall appear that any person has been duly elected President of the United States, according to the Constitution, by the electors at their first meeting, such person shall be the President; if not, and it shall appear that any person shall have received the greatest number, and also a majority, of the votes of the electors at their second meeting, such person shall be her President; but if it shall happen that no person is duly elected President of the United States, either at the first or second meeting of the electors, then the Senate and House of Representatives shall immediately, by ballot, each member of both Houses giving one vote, proceed to elect a President of the United States from the persons duly voted for at the second meeting of the electors. The said joint meeting shall consist of at least a majority of the members of each House, and a majority of the votes of all the members present at the said joint meeting shall be necessary to a choice of the President of the United States. But if no person shall receive such majority on the first, or on a second, ballot, then a plurality of the said votes shall decide the election."

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 19, 1838.—Continued.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS FOR THE POSTPONEMENT OF THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to vote and use their influence for a postponement, until the next session of Congress, of the act introduced by the Hon. Silas Wright, of New York, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill, or any other act or acts of a similar character, and that they vote at this session for no act of a similar nature; and that we have full confidence in Martin Van Buren, and in the wisdom and intelligence of our Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress; and our Senators are hereby further instructed, and our members requested, to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of the above resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

LEWIS DEWART,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. R. BURDEN,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved, the 16th day of February, 1838.

JOS RITNER.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE COMMONWEALTH,
Harrisburg, February 16, 1838.

This is to certify that the above is a true copy of the original resolutions on file in this office.

THO. H. BURROWES,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to present to the Senate a resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which I received from Governor Ritner on yesterday afternoon, requesting their Representatives in Congress, and instructing their Senators, "to vote and use their influence for a postponement, until the next session of Congress, of the act introduced by the Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, of New York, commonly called the Sub-Treasury bill, or any other act or acts of a similar character; and that they vote at this session for no act of a similar nature." The Legislature also, by the same resolution, declared that they "have full confidence in MARTIN VAN BUREN, and in the wisdom and intelligence of their Democratic Senators and Representatives in Congress;" and further instruct and request their Senators and Representatives "to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government."

I feel confident that the Senate will pardon me, considering the peculiar position in which I am placed, for making a few remarks in explanation of the course which I intend to pursue under this resolution. It is well known, both to the Senate and to the country, that at the last session of Congress, I presented my views in detail in favor of a separation of the Treasury from all banks, as fiscal agents of the Government. My opinion upon this subject remains unchanged: nay, it has been confirmed by subsequent events and subsequent reflection. After a careful examination of the bill reported by the Senator from New York, as it has been since amended, I think, in the main, it is well calculated to carry into practice this principle of separation. Whilst it increases Executive patronage to a very small extent, and no more than is absolutely necessary to carry into effect its principles, it confers no power whatever upon the Secretary of the Treasury over the public money, except that which he has exercised ever since the origin of the present Government: and a provision of the bill, which has never existed heretofore, renders it impossible that the ordinary Treasury drafts which are delivered to the public creditors should ever be used as currency. With some further amendments, which I need not now specify, but which I had intended to move, on a proper occasion, I should have given a cheerful support to this bill. But I am instructed: and it remains for me to decide what course I ought to pursue, under this change of circumstances.

Ever since I was capable of forming an opinion upon this subject, I have believed that the Legislatures of the several States had a right to instruct their Senators. In my opinion, this right results from the very nature of our Constitution, which is a Federal compact between distinct and sovereign States. It has ever been considered, with but few exceptions, a fundamental article in the political creed of that party to which I am proud to belong. I have, in public and in private, in the face of the Senate and before the country, often expressed this opinion; and I shall never preach one doctrine of political faith, and practice another. I shall never shrink from what I conceive to be my duty, because, in performing it, I may apply the torture to myself.

I know that some of my most valued friends in Pennsylvania, who hold the right of instruction to be sacred, are of opinion, that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I ought to disobey these instructions. But do they not perceive that if the Senator can look behind his instructions, the right is at once abandoned? Under the pretext, or, if you please, under the honest belief, that they do not speak the voice of the people, or that they have been corruptly or improperly obtained, a Senator could always justify himself to himself for disobedience. I shall, therefore, not disobey my instructions. My only alternative, then, is either to obey or to resign.

Upon questions of mere expediency, in which no constitutional principles are involved, it ought to be a very strong case to induce the Senator to abandon his post. If every difference of opinion between the Senator and his Legislature should produce this effect, the right of instruction itself would soon grow into disrepute, and the Senatorial term of six years, as fixed by the Constitution, would terminate whenever such a conflict of opinion should arise.

I can conceive of extreme cases in which, on questions of mere expediency, an honorable man might feel himself disgraced in even becoming the agent to give the vote of his State. No person, of any party with whom I have conversed, considers the present to be such a case; and I am confirmed in my own opinion upon this subject by the example of the Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) I shall, therefore, obey my instructions honestly and in good faith; and, like him, on every question of proposed amendments, shall give such a vote as a fair and honorable opponent of the bill ought, in my judgment, to give.

It is scarcely necessary to add that, as I am not instructed to support the substitute for the bill, offered by the Senator from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) I shall exercise my own opinion, and vote against its adoption.

I shall take leave to express my high gratification at one clause contained in the resolution of instruction. The Legislature of Pennsylvania have shown to the world that they justly appreciate the merits of the statesman whom the people of the United States have placed at the head of the Government, by declaring "their full confidence in MARTIN VAN BUREN." Such a well-deserved tribute to superior merit might be considered as the incense of flattery, had it been offered by his political friends. The reverse is the case upon the present occasion. The resolution containing this expression of confidence, on its final passage, received the vote of every Opposition member of the House of Representatives, and, I am informed, of the Senate, whether Whig or Antimason, and was approved by Joseph Ritner, Governor. Thus, even his very enemies are made to praise him. I ought to say that I have not yet received any statement of the votes of the individual Senators.

A compliment equally well deserved is paid by the resolution to the Democratic portion of the Representatives of the State in Congress. I heartily commend the Legislature for expressing full confidence in their wisdom and intelligence. A more firm, faithful, intelligent and patriotic set of men has never represented Pennsylvania.

We are also instructed, in the conclusion of the resolution, "to vote for such a mode of receiving, keeping and disbursing the public moneys, as will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government." Now it is our duty, if possible, to reconcile and render consistent the first with the last clause of the instruction, and to give to each of them its proper weight. My conception of their meaning, when thus fairly construed, is, that whilst we are bound to oppose the separation of the banks from the Government in the manner proposed by the bill of the Senator from New York, or by any bill of a similar nature, yet we are equally instructed to support any other and different "mode of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys, which will separate, as far as practicable, the banks from the Government." In short, the Legislature are friendly to such a separation; but they are opposed to its accomplishment in the manner proposed by the bill now before the Senate. Whether any other practicable mode of effecting this separation can be devised, I shall not at present pretend to say. I shall not now participate in the general debate on this bill, as I had intended, and will, therefore, have ample time for reflection on the subject; and should I become convinced that any mode can be devised of accomplishing the same object, different in its nature and character from this bill, I may perhaps present it hereafter in the form of an amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN then presented the resolutions, and on his motion they were read, and ordered to be printed, and laid upon the table.

He also gave notice that he would, at the first convenient opportunity, after consulting his colleague, move, in obedience to his instructions, to postpone the bill reported by the Senator from New York, until the next session of Congress.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, when Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate until 5 o'clock.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded—

Mr. CALHOUN rose and said he wished to make a single remark. He did not think proper to interrupt the Senator from Kentucky while he was speaking; but it was due to himself to say, that the gentleman had misstated and perverted almost every argument he (Mr. C.) had advanced. He would say more: he intended to pay his respects to that Senator at the first opportunity, both with respect to his argument and his personal attack on him; and when he did so, the debt between them should be fully cancelled.

Mr. CLAY replied that whether or not he had misstated or perverted the argument of the Senator from South Carolina, was not for that Senator to say. He (Mr. C.) would appeal to a less partial judge—to the Senate. As to any intention on the Senator's part of paying, he was as ready to receive as the gentleman was to pay. He sought a contest with no man, and he should not avoid one with the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he knew not what the Senator meant by his being ready to receive; but he would appeal to the Senate whether his remarks were not of such a character as to demand from him what he said.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN,

The Senate adjourned.

Mr. JOHNSON said it was his intention to offer a series of appropriations on this subject, and for that purpose he should move the postponement of the subject till Thursday next. Mr. J. was proceeding to explain the object he had in view, when, the morning hour being expired—

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The House then took up the special order, being the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved the 20th of April, 1818."

The bill had been reported back to the House without amendment, and was therefore in the position it was before being committed, as printed in the Globe of Saturday night last.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an additional section, providing that the bill should remain in force till the first of January, 1840, and no longer; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD then moved to amend the first section of the bill by substituting, in a modified form, the first section of the substitute proposed, when the bill was up before, by Mr. LOOMIS of New York, as follows:

"SEC. 1. No person shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, purchase or procure, collect, transport, or have in possession, any vessel, vehicle, arms, or munitions of war; or collect, or employ, or imbody, or train men, with intent to the use or employment of the same, in exciting, aiding, or carrying on, or to be used in any insurrection or rebellion against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people conterminous with the United States, with which the United States are at peace, and every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding years.

Mr. LOOMIS moved to fill up the first blank with $3,000, which was agreed to, and the amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. PATTON then proposed a substitute for the first two sections of the bill.

Mr. LOOMIS moved the second, third, fourth, and fifth sections of his substitute, somewhat modified, in lieu of Mr. PATTON's.

The merits of the bill were then discussed by Messrs. SMITH, FILLMORE, HOLSEY, LOOMIS, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, PATTON, LEGARE, BIDDLE, MENIFEE, PICKENS, CRARY, HOWARD, and ADAMS; when,

On motion of the last gentleman, the bill and amendments submitted to-day were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WISE moved the committment of the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PATTON and Mr. BELL briefly opposed the motion; when, on motion of the latter gentleman,

The House adjourned.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the claims of Caleb Atwater.

Mr. WALL, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Captain Augustus A. Nicholson; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD said that when he came into the Senate this morning, the Secretary was reading the resolutions which had recently been passed by the Senate of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The reading was nearly through; and he had been informed that one of the resolutions referred to certain proceedings which had taken place in New Hampshire, asking for the removal of the Hon. Mr. Mason from the office of president of the Branch Bank of the U. States at Portsmouth. The same allusion had been made yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky in his speech; and he then attempted, without success, to get the floor to reply to the Senator, with a view to set history right. This transaction, he believed, had been before alluded to, since the commencement of this session. He merely desired to have the resolutions of the Senate of Pennsylvania referred to the Committee on Finance, that a detailed report may be made, setting forth the facts in their true light.

The movement to remove the president of the branch bank at Portsmouth, which took place, he believed in 1829, was made in consequence of the course pursued by the then president and directors of that institution, in the management and direction of its concerns. That course had been, it was alleged, of a most oppressive character. He knew nothing of the facts, except what he derived from the printed documents and the history of the times, and if any reliance can be placed on this evidence, nothing could be more unjust than the charge which had been often repeated, that the present Secretary of the Treasury, the present Governor of the State of New Hampshire, and their political friends, had set this ball in motion to effect the removal of Mr. Mason, for the accomplishment of their political purposes, or to attain their party objects. This he could not believe, and he was well satisfied that, if this matter could be examined, it would be found that this movement was not made to accomplish the political ends of those who engaged in it, but to prevent this "United States Branch Bank" from being used exclusively as a party engine against them and their political friends. He would go no further at this time; he only wished for the reference of the resolution at this time, and he trusted that the report of the committee would but confirm what his late respected colleague (Mr. HILL) had once said on this floor, with so much effect, with reference to this subject.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked that it was no more true that the bill before the Senate came from the Committee on Finance, or that the message received at the commencement of the session came from the President of the United States, than it was true that the application to remove the president of the Bank of Portsmouth was a political matter entirely. The whole matter was established by documentary evidence. There was a letter written by a gentleman to the Secretary of the Treasury; and in that letter the writer gives, as a reason why the president of the bank should be removed, that he belonged to the party opposed to the Administration. There was another letter by the side of it, written to a gentleman then holding an office here under the Government, and now Governor of New Hampshire; and that letter says that this is expected to be done by the friends of General Jackson. Now what did the Senator from New Hampshire mean, when he said that the application was made by men of both political parties? In the steps taken to get signers to such a petition, it was very easy to get signers of all political parties, by appealing to men who wish to get money easier. If the gentleman wished to get the matter before the Committee on Finance, why let him come on; he (Mr. W.) was ready to meet him.

Mr. HUBBARD said he was agreed; he would most cheerfully, most willingly, accept the challenge of the Senator. He wished to go into the examination; he desired to collect the facts; he would not wish to prejudge this case. He had for himself a very decided opinion; he might, however, be wrong, but he must have been greatly in error if he should not be able to present the facts in this case to the satisfaction of himself at least, and, he trusted, to the satisfaction of the Senate and of the country, that this branch was managed at the time, not to favor the mercantile community of Portsmouth, but its favors were distributed to partisans friendly to the men in the charge of the branch.

He was certain that the individual who headed the Portsmouth memorial, was the strong political friend of Mr. Mason. Up to this moment, he was the active supporter of a United States Bank. Others would be found on the list, equally friendly to the political views of the incumbent. One of them, if he could rely upon the newspapers of the day, was busily engaged at this time on his mission in scattering "party tracts" to enlighten the people of New Hampshire, preparatory to the coming election. That memorial, it will be found, was made up of men without party distinction, and for the sole purpose of correcting what they regarded as an oppressive evil.

Let then the facts be collected, and be presented. The Senator and myself are both members of the Committee on Finance; and he had no doubt that the truth of this whole matter would be elicited. His object was to exempt the Governor of New Hampshire and the Secretary of the Treasury from the censure which was repeatedly cast upon them in relation to this transaction.

He had no other feeling but that of respect for the distinguished gentleman who at that time presided over the branch at Portsmouth. He knew him well, perhaps not as well as the Senator himself. His only purpose was, in moving the reference, to collect the facts; and if they showed an organized party movement to convert the influence of the bank to the promotion of their political purposes, so let it be. If the facts will show that the movement was to prevent the use of the power of the bank to accomplish the objects of those politically opposed to the then Administration of the Government, so let it be. He, in conclusion, would only say, that he would be ready with the Senator most willingly at any time to enter upon this examination.

Mr. WEBSTER said he gave no challenge. He only accepted one. He was not desirous to go into details; but if the gentlemen chose to take such a course, entertaining the respect he did for the character of the parties implicated, he was ready to meet him. The question was not whether it was exclusively a movement on a certain side; the question was as to the origin of the movement. He now contended that the movement was entirely political, and he would tell how it turned out. The president of the Bank of the United States, on receiving the application, went to Portsmouth to inquire into the facts, and sent a complimentary notice to all who had signed it to call on him and explain the nature of the complaints. They came; and some said that they had signed the petition because they had been asked to do so; some said that they had no knowledge of the subject; and others said that they had signed it because of the difficulties they found in getting discounts.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, "when Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war." It was not his purpose to take any part in the high contest between the two distinguished Senators. He desired merely to observe, that, in obeying his instructions, he should construe them fairly, according to their own import and language; and not according to the construction which had been placed upon them, after their passage, by the Senate of Pennsylvania, which constituted but one branch of the State Legislature.

He had stated yesterday, that he had been informed that every member of the Opposition party in the Senate had voted for the resolution. He knew that this statement was true in regard to the House; but he perceived from the Harrisburg papers, which had been since received, that the resolution in the Senate had been divided into three distinct clauses, and that six members of the Opposition had voted against that clause of them which expressed full confidence in MARTIN VAN BUREN, and in the intelligence and wisdom of their Democratic Senators and Representatives.

He made the correction, because he would never willingly state any thing in the Senate or elsewhere which did not exactly conform with the truth.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The Senate then resumed the discussion of the Independent Treasury bill, when

Mr. ALLEN rose and addressed the Senate until near five o'clock.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate went into Executive business; and, after a few moments spent therein,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1838.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the bill in relation to the preservation of neutrality on the frontier was made the special order after one o'clock this day.

Mr. REED asked leave to submit a resolution, granting the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives to the Congressional Temperance Society on Tuesday evening.

Objection being made—

Mr. REED moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, (no quorum voting on the first count,) which were ordered, and were—yeas 82, nays 43, not two-thirds, so the rule was not suspended.

Mr. POTTS moved a suspension of the rule, to enable him to submit a motion to print 2000 extra copies of the communication of the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the causes which have delayed the sailing of the Exploring Expedition; but the House refused.

Reports from committees were then called for.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, Mr. STUART of Virginia, and Mr. DARLINGTON, severally made unfavorable reports from the Committee of Claims.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the "bill to increase the army of the United States, and for other purposes," and the same was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMERCE.

Mr. TOLAND reported a bill for the relief of Joseph R. Folsom and the owners and crew of the schooner Galaxy, of Bucksport, in the State of Maine.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS made an unfavorable report on the petition of Edward Cavena.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HARLAN reported Senate bill, providing for the legal adjudication and settlement of the claims for land under grants to the Baron Bastrop and others in Louisiana, and of sundry persons in Arkansas, with a recommendation that it do not pass, and moved its committment.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana said this was a very important measure, involving the settlement of two counties in Louisiana, and of large tracts in Arkansas, and had been reported on favorably by every committee of both Houses for several years past, and bills passed by one body or the other, and he therefore moved the recommitment of the bill, with instructions to the Committee on Private Land Claims to report some other bill for the settlement of these claims.

Mr. YELL united in the wish of the gentleman from Louisiana, that this subject should be definitively disposed of. It was true, that a portion of his State was interested in it; but the great body of the people there felt none, and all he desired was to see the question settled one way or the other. The claims involved about a million of acres in Arkansas, and at out twice as much in Louisiana, all of which the Government had sold, without paying any sort of regard to these claims. Now, if the claims should turn out to be good—he would pronounce no opinion about them, but many believed them to be so—the Government must either satisfy the claimants, or refund the money to the purchasers. It was important, therefore, in every point of view, that the subject should be disposed of. This might be done in either of two ways—by referring it to a special commission, or by leaving it, as the Senate proposed to do, to the Judiciary. Those who wished the matter settled were indifferent which mode should be adopted, so that it was disposed of.

With reference to an examination by the House itself, Mr. Y. said it would be impracticable, and the expense of a single session upon its discussion would amount to more than the whole supervision of the subject as proposed by the bill. It had now been several years before Congress, and would continue to be presented for as many years to come, unless Congress passed some measure to quiet it. Both as a matter of economy and policy, it seemed to him that the subject should be at once disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana took the same side, and stated that the people of Louisiana felt a deep and lively interest in the subject, and had great cause to complain of the Government which had suffered these claims to remain in abeyance for thirty-four years. Mr. J. was proceeding, when the hour of one having arrived, the Chair announced the special order.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The House then took up the special order, being the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved the 20th of April, 1818."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. WISE to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was now taken, and disagreed to.

The question then pending was the substitute for part of

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 13.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

the first and the whole of the second sections of the bill submitted yesterday by Mr. PATTON.

Mr. HOWARD stated that the principles on which this bill was based, had been the uniform principles of this Government ever since its formation. It had always been the policy of this Government to remain at peace with all nations, and to enforce its neutrality whenever it become necessary to do so. This principle was adopted in the act of 1794, which he wished the House to bear in mind. At that time this country began to feel the situation in which it was placed by being called upon by a foreign power to enforce its neutrality. Congress then passed a law to prevent the enlistment of men, within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of carrying on hostility against any Government with which we might be at peace. The bill went on to provide that no vessel, for this purpose, should be fitted out within our waters, and that no vessel of a foreign nation shall increase its armament for the purpose of carrying on such war.

This bill vested power in the President to employ the army and navy for the purpose of enforcing this law. This bill, then, only provided for the prevention of the fitting out of naval expeditions, and the enlisting of soldiers within our territory, to carry on war against a nation with which we might be at peace. Afterwards, when a war broke out between France and England, it became necessary to make further provision to preserve our neutrality in consequence of the change of circumstances. It then became necessary to prevent the fitting out of privateers in our waters; and in addition to the provisions of the law of 1794, it became necessary to vest in the President power to authorize the collectors to seize upon vessels fitting out in our waters. Now, the face of things has again changed, and it becomes necessary for us to make further changes in our legislation. In consequence of the small number of our collectors on the frontier, it became necessary that the President should call to his aid other officers, for the purpose of enforcing our neutrality. It became necessary for us to bring the aid of the civil power to co-operate with the military power in preserving our neutrality, as that duty is now conferred almost exclusively on the military power. This he considered to be improper, and hoped gentlemen were not disposed to keep up such exhibitions as we have had for the last few weeks. He hoped we were not to have a body of armed men marching to and fro, arresting and disarming persons who might be about to violate our neutrality, when that duty could be as well and better performed by the civil authority. We have recently seen a part of the army of the United States, engaged in marching several hundred miles, for the purpose of arresting and disarming some two or three hundred persons, who had assembled for the purpose of entering Canada. This was a spectacle which he did not desire to see kept up, and he hoped the House would make such provision speedily as would supersede the necessity of such military operations. The civil authority, he maintained, ought first to be applied, and when it failed, there would be time enough to call in the aid of the military power. The civil power, however, he believed would be amply sufficient to preserve our neutral relations with Canada.

With regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. PATTON) he considered it, in point of substance, as pretty near meeting his views, and, for the sake of compromise on this matter, he would have no objection to vote for it. Then if it was adopted, he thought he could lay before the House some amendments to some of the remaining sections of the bill as would meet the views of the members of the House generally. In conclusion, he would suggest to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOOMIS) the propriety of moving to reconsider his amendment, with a view to making some alterations in the phraseology of his amendment, which would make it more acceptable to many members of the House.

Mr. LOOMIS then moved a reconsideration of the vote on agreeing to the amendment to the first section of the bill, in order to meet the views of the gentleman from Maryland; which motion was agreed to, and the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. L. then proposed to modify his amendment by striking out the words "insurrection and rebellion," and insert, "military operation or expedition."

Mr. ADAMS suggested to the gentleman from New York the propriety of substituting the word "within" for the word "against," immediately after the word "rebellion." If this modification was made, this part of the bill would meet his views.

Mr. LOOMIS accepted of this suggestion, and modified his amendment accordingly.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. LOOMIS.)

Mr. MERCER replied to the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HOWARD,) and contended that the power under the laws of 1794 and 1818, was ample for the purpose of arresting all the expeditions which might be undertaken against Canada. The defect was not in the law, but in the administration of the law. It was with infinite surprise that he had seen the President of the United States call upon the Governor of New York to issue his proclamation to enforce a law, when the Executive should have issued his own proclamation, as it was a law of the United States which was to be enforced.

Mr. SHIELDS concurred entirely in the view taken of this question, by the gentleman from Virginia. He thought that the existing laws sufficient for all purposes, and with a view of getting rid of this embarrassing question, he moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman would withdraw this motion, so as to enable the friends of this new fashioned alien and sedition law to make it as perfect as possible.

Mr. SHIELDS could not consent that the time of the House should be taken up with this matter, otherwise he would withdraw the motion to oblige the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, which were ordered, and were—yeas 20, nays 161.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. TOUCEY hoped that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York would not be adopted. He concurred in the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) that this amendment, if incorporated in the bill, would make it substantially the act of 1818. It did not materially alter the law as it now stands, except that it carried the law to an extent which he utterly deprecated. By the provisions of the bill under consideration, if it should be adopted, it would authorize the United States Government officers to seize any vessel at any future time, of any persons in Canada, who might be resisting the Government, and holding them to security in a large amount. No matter under what circumstances the patriots of Canada might be driven into our borders, this bill authorized and directed the officers of the United States Government to seize upon them, and hold them in security to a large amount. The effect of it then would be that, if any persons, at any future time, who might be struggling against the power and oppression of a Government which they considered tyrannical, should be driven by their oppressors within our borders, they were to be seized upon and fined and imprisoned. This was a principle which he never could consent to, and he hoped it would not meet the concurrence of a majority of this body. For his own part, he much preferred the bill as it came from the Senate, and he was surprised to hear the bitter opposition which was raised against it in that shape. Mr. T. addressed the House at some length in opposition to the amendment proposed by Mr. LOOMIS.

Mr. HOLSEY supported the bill in a speech of some length. He considered it to be the duty of this Government to preserve its neutrality towards all nations with which it might be at peace, and, he contended, that there was no way of doing this but by the Government preventing its citizens from interfering in the affairs of foreign Governments. This was the duty of our Government, and he would ask gentlemen if the existing laws were sufficient for this purpose? They certainly were not.

This principle had been held by this Government from its foundation, and he would ask gentlemen if they were prepared now to pursue a different course of policy? He referred to the correspondence between Mr. Madison, when Secretary of State, and Mr. Pinckney, our minister at that time in Spain, in which Mr. Madison took the ground that it was the duty of that Government not only to restrain its own citizens from fitting out expeditions against foreign Governments, with which that Government might be at peace, but that it was the duty of that Government to restrain foreigners within their borders from interfering or meddling with the affairs of other Governments.

This doctrine he held to be the correct doctrine; and it being correct, we would be held responsible for the acts of our citizens, if we neglected to provide the proper means of restraining them from interfering in the affairs of neighboring Governments with which we were at peace. The policy of our Government he held to be a policy of extreme caution; and that being the case, we ought to provide all proper means for preventing our citizens from interfering in the affairs of Canada. He replied to the arguments of Mr. TOUCEY, and supported the object of the bill, at some length.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did not rise to engage in debate, but he felt himself called upon to draw the attention of the House not only to the nature of the question itself, and the imperative necessity of acting upon it promptly, but also of the great mass of public business, of a character almost equally urgent, remaining to be acted upon. It might be very convenient for them to be going on, from day to day, and from month to month, in protracted discussions, while they were supported by the credit of the officers of the two Houses, but when they considered the nature and present condition of the public service throughout the Union, he earnestly appealed to gentlemen to have some little compassion for those in the public service who had had nothing to support them since the first of January.

In regard to this measure, what a spectacle did they present. By the last intelligence it was stated that an expedition to cross our frontier and invade the province of Canada, was to cross the frontier to morrow (the 22d). Now, Mr. C. appealed to gentlemen, and especially to legal gentlemen, to look seriously at the nature of this question. They were arguing it as if it was as an ordinary case between billigerents, or as if it was one on the Texas frontier, where a vast wilderness of a thousand miles intervened between the two countries, and they seemed to forget that this was a case of two nations face to face as it were, in close contact to each other, and that our great duty was to endeavor to preserve peace between us. Both Governments, both nations, were earnestly desirous to avoid a war, and how could we do it but by giving our officers on the frontier the means of stopping these expeditions from our territory.

Mr. C. added that, upon a question of this character, he could not stop to inquire about this mode or that mode, for it was a question between two great nations, and involved the question of war between this country and Great Britain. They now saw hundreds about to cross the frontier; these would be met by British troops; these hundreds on both sides the frontier might be followed by thousands, and then by tens of thousands, and in spite of all the ardent desire of two great nations, these struggles on the frontier might lead to war, and all this was commenced, and might be going on, while that House was engaged in debate. But he would not go further into the question. What they had to do upon this subject must be done efficiently and promptly, if it was to answer any purpose at all; and he appealed to the House to decide this question one way or the other, either by adopting some measure, or rejecting the subject altogether.

Mr. ADAMS denied that any haste was necessary, for this was not a case of the tomahawk and scalping knife character. Mr. A. went on, at some length, to argue against the original, though he believed he should vote for the modified substitute to the first section, submitted by Mr. LOOMIS, and that of Mr. PATTON.

Mr. WISE then moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, when Mr. W. withdrew the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON again drew the attention of the House to the amendment of the Constitution providing against illegal seizures and searches, and argued upon it at some length.

Some other amendments were laid on the table, to be submitted hereafter, when, without taking any question, the bill was laid aside.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the annual statemen of the First Comptroller of the Treasury of the unexpended balances, which, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, was laid on the table. The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of War, in answer to the resolution of the 7th instant, requiring information whether a site has been purchased for a fort near the western frontiers of Arkansas; whether a good title to the land can be procured; and, if so, why an appropriation has not been asked for the purchase and construction of the fort.

Mr. SEVIER moved to refer the report to the Committee on Military Affairs. He would take this occasion to say that he was disappointed very much, not only as regarded the want of action on the part of the War Department, but as regarded their present report in excuse of it. Henceforth, he would give up all hopes from that quarter, and throw himself on the kindness and justice of his friend from Missouri, the chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. BENTON;) and when he got such a report from that committee as he anticipated, he would endeavor to carry a bill through Congress by his own exertions, aided by his friends. Situated as the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri were, they did not know at what moment a war might break out; and yet, though they had been relying for years on the War Department, it did not seem that they thought the having a fort on that frontier at all necessary. Henceforth, (Mr. S. said,) he would rely on the Military Committee, and throw aside the reports of the Secretary's brigadiers, major generals, and all.

The report was then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIR communicated a letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing the official report of the battle fought on the 25th December last, between the United States troops and the Seminole Indians, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
February 20, 1838.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of Col. Taylor's official report of the action of the 25th of December last, between the troops under his command and the Seminole Indians.

As it has been supposed that some expressions contained in that report cast unmerited censure upon the Missouri Volunteers, I avail myself of the occasion to remove so erroneous an impression. The patriotic feelings which led these brave men to volunteer their services in Florida, and to leave their homes to engage in a campaign against the Indians, was duly appreciated by the President and by this Department; and in their opinion the pledge thus given to the country has been amply redeemed. The fact that they broke and retired in disorder, under the murderous fire of an enemy as advantageously posted as if they had been behind regular entrenchments, is not stated to disparage the character or the efforts of the young soldiers. The heavy loss they sustained, in killed and wounded, affords sufficient proof of the firmness with which they advanced upon the enemy under a galling fire. It was not expected that their unaided efforts could drive the enemy from his strong hold, and the gallant manner in which they led the attack contributed, no doubt, to the success of the day. I may be permitted to say, that no blame can rightly be attached to the gallant officer who commanded the troops, on that occasion, for placing the Volunteers in the front rank of the action. The enemy occupied a position that could not be turned, and from which he could only be driven by the utmost efforts of the regular forces. The task of storming such defences could not be entrusted to the Volunteers; nor would an experienced officer rely upon irregular troops to form the reserve, as on the steady conduct of this force the fate of the action often depends; and on all occasions it is, or ought to be, composed of the choicest and best disciplined troops of the army. If, therefore, the Volunteers were to be brought into action at all, they were placed where alone they could do good service by commencing the action as skirmishers; and their conduct on that occasion was all that could be expected from undisciplined troops, who, for the first time, find themselves in so trying a situation.

Very respectfully,
Your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

HON. R. M. JOHNSON,
President of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON said he had to express his great satisfaction at the letter of the Secretary. It was entirely satisfactory to him, and he had no doubt it would be equally so to the volunteers of the whole country. All that he asked was, that the papers might be printed and laid on the table: agreed to.

The CHAIR also communicated a report from the Secretary of War in answer to the resolution of the 29th December last, in relation to the conduct of the Seminole war; which, on motion of Mr. DAVIS, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, in pursuance of notice given, and on leave, introduced a bill to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation and growth, of tropical plants: read twice, and referred.

Mr. YOUNG, in pursuance of notice given, and on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Benjamin Parsons; which was trice read, and referred.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of —— Thompson, a scientific gentleman of the Southwest, setting forth a plan for reclaiming the low grounds on the borders of the Western rivers and bayous: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER moved that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the trustees of McDonough college, asking for a grant of lands: agreed to.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Daniel Marsack, praying for the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land on Grand river: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINN gave notice that he would, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for the purchase of the right to use the Vapor Bath of Dr. Boyd Reilly, in the army and navy of the United States.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution, which lies one day on the table for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for a survey of the coast of Louisiana, from the Baliza to the Sabine, and of the intermediate harbors, bays, and bayous, with a view to report to Congress at the next session, on the practicability and cost of rendering such harbors, bays, and bayous, more easy and safe of access.

Mr. McKEAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an allowance for house rent to the officers of the Navy Yard at Philadelphia.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution which was considered and adopted.

Resolved, That the Committee of Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a remission of the duties on certain goods of J. W. Zacharie and Co. destroyed by fire in the city of New Orleans, on the 3d of January, 1838.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Jonesborough, in Union county, Illinois, by way of Willard's and Smith's ferries, on the Mississippi river, to Jackson, in Cape Girardeau county, in the State of Missouri; and, also, a post road from Liberty, on the Mississippi river, in Jackson county, Illinois, down along the bottom of said river, by way of Willard's ferry, to Clear Creek Landing, in Alexander county, in said last mentioned State.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of the Agricultural Convention of New York, praying for the passage of a law providing for the procuring of valuable foreign seeds and plants, and the establishment of an office at the Seat of Government for their distribution: referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of granting to the State of Indiana the right of preemption to the lands in that State, acquired by the late treaty with the Miami Indians, together with the memorial of the said State on the same subject, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. TIPTON moved to amend Mr. WALKER's motion, by recommitting the memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions to bring in a bill in conformity with the wishes of his State. It would be recollected by the Senate, (Mr. T. said,) that in 1827, Congress granted to the State of Indiana the one-half of the lands lying within five miles of the line of a canal, to connect at navigable points the waters of the Wabash, with the waters of Lake Erie. Eighty miles of canal was finished and navigable within the State of Indiana. Ohio had seventy-eight miles of this canal line within her limits; she has accepted the grant made for that part of the work; had put it under contract. That part of the canal in Indiana not completed was rapidly progressing to completion. Funds were needed to carry on the work. The lands lately ceded by the Miami Indians, were situated near the canal, and were valuable. The quantity ceded was about 215,000 acres, a large portion of which was enhanced in value by the industry of the people of Indiana. The Legislature asked Congress for the right to purchase these lands at the minimum price, and he (Mr. T.) would not conceal the fact, that by granting what the General Assembly asked it would be greatly beneficial to the State, and would increase her internal improvement fund $100,000.

Mr. WALKER said the memorial that the committee wished to be discharged from the further consideration of, was a request on the part of the State of Indiana, that Congress would grant her a pre-emption right, at the usual price of one dollar and a quarter an acre, to the lands lately obtained from the Miami Indians, and which were considered highly valuable. In looking over the grants to that State, it would be found that she had already received grants for 534,000 acres of land, for purposes of internal improvement, while he was prepared to show that several of the new States were carrying on works much more extensive than those of Indiana, without having obtained an acre. Mr. W. gave an account of the works chartered, and in progress, in the State of Mississippi, to which there had been upwards of four millions subscribed, and paid up, and upwards of eight millions subscribed and secured. And yet Indiana, which had already received 534,000 acres, was making a demand for more, while the States carrying on more extensive improvements had received nothing.

Mr. W. thought that before Indiana, asking for the further bounty of the Government, she ought at least to assist in carrying a bill through Congress, to give something to her sister States, who had not been so liberally dealt with. But what did the Senator from Indiana ask? He asked the Senate to commit itself, by directing a committee to bring in a bill granting to the State what she asked, without looking at the documents, and without considering the reasonableness of the prayer. If this was to be done, the Senate would commit itself, by building up one or two States, while they were refusing an acre to States, whose claims were equally as great, if not greater.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said the debate in this instance had sprung up very unexpectedly to him. He certainly did not expect a report from the Committee on Public Lands in relation to this subject; indeed, the other business before the Senate forbade the idea that we should have had a report of any kind at so early a period. He did not rise, therefore, to debate the general proposition of the grant of the Miami lands to the State of Indiana, nor did he think the Senate prepared, at this time, to discuss the question. He came to the Senate this morning fully expecting the Cumberland road bill to be taken up, and for this he was prepared, and would not, at this time, be driven into a debate on the pre-emption question. When, however, that should come up, he hoped to be able to show that the arguments of the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. WALKER) were neither sound nor tenable.

He was surprised that the arguments of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands should be so diametrically different from those used in the discussion when the general pre-emption bill was under consideration. In that debate he understood the honorable chairman to say that the whole number of settlers on the public lands to whom pre-emption rights had been granted, had not affected the sales more than one cent the acre, the average being about a dollar twenty-six cents. What had the State of Indiana asked, but to be permitted to have these lands at the minimum price, to aid her in the works of internal improvement which she had commenced, and by which the Government had received more than an equivalent in the enhanced value of the public lands in that State? Was there any donation in that? Did not the General Government receive within one cent of the average rate, according to the Senator's own showing? He thought the subject might very properly be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and when that committee had examined the subject fully and impartially, and reported a bill, the Senate would then be prepared to act as the justice and equity of the proceeding would warrant. Mr. S. thought it would be no bounty to any of the States to be permitted to take the public lands within their limits at the minimum price; but, on the contrary, that it would be the best contract the Government could possibly make.

Mr. WALKER observed, that to cut short the debate, he would propose to the Senator from Indiana to modify his motion, so as to refer the memorial to the Committee on Roads and Canals, without saying any thing about instructions. If the Senator would so modify his motion, he would vote for it. [Mr. TIPTON declining]—Then, said Mr. W. the Senate must decide as it thinks best on the motion. He stated the fact just now, that Indiana had received 534,000 acres of land for internal improvements, while Mississippi, who was carrying on more extensive works, had not received an acre. The same fact also applied to Alabama, who was carrying on her works of internal improvement in a more extended way than those of Indiana. He would state further, that upwards of a million of dollars of the two per cent. fund of Indiana had been drawn and expended, while Mississippi had not drawn a cent of her fund. Under these circumstances, he must therefore say, that if Indiana succeeded, he would regard it as a monopoly. He admitted that he did state in his remarks on the pre-emption bill, that the receipts of the sales to the pre-emptioners was within a cent of the whole average price. The Senator, therefore, quoted him correctly. But his remarks were applicable only to the settlers on the frontiers—to the pioneers who opened the lands, and gave them additional value. How was it, though, with the State of Indiana, and these lands acquired from the Miami Indians? Was that State a pioneer, and were these lands on the frontiers? On the contrary, the lands were in the heart of the State, and a great many of them, as admitted by one of the Indiana Senators, worth $40 per acre. Mr. W. said he was opposed to any further grants to Indiana till the other new States received an equal share of the Government's liberality.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, was glad to perceive that the dissensions exhibited on the subject would be likely to lead to a proper adjustment, wherein the rights of the old States might be properly respected. Mr. C. said he was for doing justice, liberal justice, alike to knew and old. He had not risen for the purpose of discussing the subject, for that was out of his power just now if he were so inclined, being entirely too unwell to enter into it, but merely to recommend to the Senator from Indiana (Mr. TIPTON) the acceptance of the suggestion offered. The subject could be recommitted, not with the instructions moved for, but with instructions to inquire into and report all the facts in relation to the matter, and that, in his opinion, would be the better course. So far as he, Mr. C. was concerned, he had no hesitation in avowing that if the question was whether the State should have the lands, or those who had seized upon them without sanction of law and in violation of public authority, he should go for the State. Indiana asked them to aid her in completing her great works of internal improvement, works that would not only redound to the honor of Indiana, but to the true interest of other States. He was not prepared to say that he was altogether willing to grant the preemption to Indiana at the minimum price, as the land was said, in many instances, to be worth thirty, forty and even fifty dollars per acre; but he was prepared to say that he was willing the State should have it at the price lands had risen to on the Ohio canal, which were understood to average some four or five dollars. At all events, if the question was between the State, and the individuals alluded to, he should take great pleasure in giving the State the preference.

Mr. TIPTON said that his purpose would be best effected by persisting in the motion to commit with instructions, as at first presented. His object, as at first stated, was to secure for his State the pre-emption these lands, for the purpose of enabling her to carry on the important works now in progress, to which he had just referred. No individual right of pre-emption could vest in these lands; and as the State was under a heavy debt for carrying on her works, he had hoped that there would be no objection to her obtaining the privilege by which nobody would be injured. It was all important that his State, and the people should know at an early day what they were to expect. If they were to have this grant, they ought to know it in time to make their arrangements, before the working season commences, and if they were not to have it, it was equally important to them to know it in time to look out for other resources. This was the principal reason why he could not accede to the gentleman from Mississippi's request to committee the memorial without instructions, for by that course they might not get a direct vote until the season for commencing work had gone by. He had no other object in view than that of a Senator who was serving his State, feebly perhaps, but with his best abilities. He, therefore, could not consent to the modification of the motion, and asked for the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. KING was fully aware of the zeal with which the Senator from Indiana (Mr. TIPTON) advocated the interests of the State he represented; but he thought that, on this occasion, the Senator manifested more zeal in favor of a case which could not be sustained than was usual. The Committee on Public Lands, which was as well constituted a committee as any in the Senate, had given this subject a thorough examination, and had reported against it. What then did the Senator from Indiana propose? After a full examination of the subject, and a report against it, he asked the Senate to send it to another committee to which it did not properly belong, with instructions to report in favor of it. Was not this asking rather too much from the Senate when its members had had no opportunity of being informed of the merits of the case? It was not only an unusual case, but is not consistent with reason and justice. He would not enter into an examination of the comparative justice of the claims of the new States for grants of land for internal improvements. He knew that Indiana had received a great deal from the Government, and he admitted that she had expended it, not only to her advantage, but to that of the Union. But as to any increased value given to the public lands through which her improvements passed, he presumed that it was pretty much like what it was elsewhere, and that the lands when sold had not brought more than the minimum price.

Mr. K. thought that they should not, without examination, make large grants to the States. The Treasury wanted money, and the lands should be sold. The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) said that he would prefer giving the pre-emption to these lands to the State instead of giving it to individuals; and that, in consequence of the increased value given to them by settlements around them, and a dense population, he would ask three or four dollars an acre. Now he (Mr. K.) would not bargain in that way with one of the States of this Union. If, said he, we give the lands to the State, let us give them liberally. He had more feeling towards the unfortunate settlers on the public lands than the Senator from Kentucky. He appreciated the merits of the new States, whose works of internal improvement were giving value to the public domain, yet he had strong feelings for the settlers. They were the men who had performed the labor, whose hard hands had felled the trees, and cleared the forest, and brought the wilderness into cultivation; and he would not hesitate to give them the preference over a State.

Mr. K. said, in conclusion, that he was for first discharging the Committee on Public Lands from the further consideration of the memorial, and then the question might subsequently be taken on reference to another committee.

Mr. LINN suggested to the Senator from Indiana a further modification, to which he thought both parties might assent, to wit: that the said committee be instructed to report a bill granting to the States all the unsurveyed lands within their limits covered by water. It was well known that large portions of land in some of the States were at times covered with water to an immense extent, which the Government officers had reported as not worth the cost of survey. If these lands were ceded to the States in which they lie, it might be attended with the most beneficial results. Those inundated lands were a curse to the States; they were the very hotbeds of disease, generating that dreadful malaria so fatal in its influence upon the surrounding country. If all such were given to the States, at least such as were deemed unworthy the cost of survey, they might be reclaimed, so as to prevent the ill effects usually arising from them.

Mr. DAVIS said he thought that we were now in a fair way of driving a bargain in relation to public lands. One State wants the lands for purposes of carrying on internal improvement, while another asks for them that she may be allowed to reclaim such as the Government deem worthless. Before he could vote for ceding such lands to the States where they lie, he should like to have all the necessary information before him. Mr. D. said he had some experience in these matters years ago. When in the other branch of the Legislature, he had introduced a plan by which the States had given to them, for canals and other improvements, each alternate section where the improvements were. The committee had judged, and he thought wisely, that if the improvements were what they ought to be, each alternate section would be worth the whole; and he was glad to find that his early impressions were correct. What he should like to know, however, was, whether the Government or individuals had received the benefit. Had we not, by careless legislation on this subject, given individuals license to go on and avail themselves of all the benefits of these improvements? If no one else did, he would himself introduce a resolution requiring the Committee on the Public Lands to inquire into and report on the matter. The question now was, whether we should give the State of Indiana the lands or her improvements at the minimum price; and for that he was not prepared to vote just now. He wanted further information before he would feel justified in giving his vote. He must be allowed to say that he did not consider the remarks of the Senator from Alabama as at all applicable to him.

Mr CLAY of Kentucky said he would repeat what he had said in relation to those people who had gone on the public lands, and they might make the most of it. "He had denounced all persons who had gone on the public lands without the authority of law as intruders and trespassers on the public domain." That was what he said, and what he still maintained; and in relation to the Miami reserve, he would go for the State against all those persons.

Mr. LINN expressed himself determined to battle for his amendment: there was no difficulty in ascertaining the quantity of land. All had been returned on the plots surveyed, and a gentleman from Missouri had made a most elaborate and eloquent report on the very subject, one among the most able and comprehensive document, he would say that had ever emanated from any source. If public officers had reported these lands not worth the cost of surveying, Congress would be giving very little.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the whole subject was then laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of the members of the bar of Columbus, Mississippi, requesting the establishment of a district court for the northern part of the State; and in furtherance of that object, submitted a resolution referring the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TIPTON moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the continuance of the Cumberland road; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. TIPTON, SMITH of Indiana, WRIGHT, LINN, ROBINSON, and YOUNG took part, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 21, as follows, the VICE-PRESIDENT giving the casting vote against the motion.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—21.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to take up the resolution submitted by him some days since at the instance of the Hon. Mr. RUGGLES, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the subject-matter of the letter of the Hon. JOHN RUGGLES, of the 13th inst. to a member of the Senate, which was laid before the Senate this day.

The motion having been agreed to, and the resolution being before the Senate,

Mr. NORVELL moved to amend it by the insertion of the usual words "and that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers."

This motion was agreed to; when

Mr. CALHOUN moved further to amend the resolution by inserting the words "and to inquire into other similar charges;" and this amendment having been also agreed to,

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a committee of five, when it appeared that Messrs. WHITE, DAVIS, WEBSTER, STRANGE, and TALLMADGE were chosen.

Mr. STRANGE then asked to be excused from serving on the committee. In the first place, he said that possibly some information might be demanded from him by the committee; secondly, he had had conversations on the subject with the member, supposed to be implicated; and lastly he boarded with that member in the same mess.

On taking the vote, Mr. STRANGE was excused.

Mr. WEBSTER asked to be excused on the ground that his engagements would not permit him to serve; and he also was excused.

Mr. DAVIS asked to be excused from serving on the plea of having more business to attend to in the committees of the Senate, than he could well perform; but on taking the vote, the Senate refused to excuse him—yeas 15, nays 17.

The two members who had recived the next highest number of ballots, Messrs. YOUNG and CRITTENDEN were then declared to be members of the committee, in place of Messrs. STRANGE and WEBSTER, excused. The committee therefore consists of Messrs. WHITE, [chairman,] DAVIS, TALLMADGE, YOUNG, and CRITTENDEN.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Independent Treasury bill was then taken up as the order of the day; but

Mr. CRITTENDEN intimating a wish to address the Senate on the subject, and stating his inability to go on then from indisposition,

Mr. WRIGHT said that he was perfectly willing to pass the bill by informally, and go on with some other business. This being agreed to by general consent,

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, was taken up.

Mr NORVELL submitted the following amendment, and moved to lay the bill on the table, and print the amendment.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be granted to each of the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Michigan, a quantity of public land lying within their respective limits, equal to the number of acres which have been granted by Congress to the State of Ohio, for purposes of internal improvement; and that there shall be granted to each of the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, a quanty of land, lying within their respective limits, which, with that which has been heretofore granted by Congress to those States respectively, for purposes of internal improvement, shall equal the number of acres granted by Congress to the said State of Ohio, for the like purposes of internal improvement; to be selected insuch manner as the Legislatures thereof shall direct, and located in parcels conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, of not less than three hundred and twenty acres in any one location, on any public land subject to entry at private sale; which said locations may be made at any time within five years after the lands of the United States in said States, respectively, shall have been surveyed and offered at public sale according to existing laws.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the lands herein granted to the States above named shall not be disposed of at a price less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, until otherwise directed by a law of the United States; and the nett proceeds of the sales of said lands shall be faithfully applied to objects of iuternal improvement within the States aforesaid, respectively, namely: roads, bridges, and canals, and improvement of water-courses, and draining swamps; and such roads, canals, bridges, and water-courses, when made or improved, shall free for the transportation of the United States mail and munitions of war, and for the passage of their troops, without the payment of any toll whatever.

At the request of Mr. TIPTON, Mr. NORVELL temporarily withdrew his motion to lay the bill on the table; and

Mr. TIPTON, after some remarks, called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. NORVELL then renewed his motion, and the question was taken and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rives, Roane, Walker, Wall, and Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Grundy, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, and Young—19.

Mr. NORVELL then moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till to-morrow. The amendment, he said, was a very important one, and one that properly ought to be tacked to the bill. It was a kindred subject also; and by moving to attach it to the bill, he wished to learn whether the treasures of this Government were to be monopolised by two or three States only. He did not, however, wish to go into this part of the subject at this time. All that he wanted was for the Senate to extend the usual courtesy to his motion.

Mr. BENTON said the bill before him was an old acquaintance. He had been familiar with it as long as he had been in public life, and had always voted against any proposition to amend it, by attaching any matter not exclusively pertaining to itself. So far as the amendment of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. NORVELL) went, he was entirely in favor of it; and if the Senator would introduce a bill to that effect, he would give it his most hearty concurrence. As an amendment to the bill before them, however, he held it to be an incumbrance, and calculated to embarrass its passage. It had related to nothing but the road for the last twenty years: it never had any other matter appended to it. The appropriations asked were for that object, and that alone.

Mr. NORVELL replied that the distinguished Senator from Missouri was an old member, and the subject was therefore entirely familiar to him. The subject was also familiar to him (Mr. N.) but not to the same extent. He asked for a postponement but for one day, for the purpose of having his amendment printed, and laid before the members of the Senate, which was a request he had never seen denied. The bill proposed, in the present embarrassed state of the Treasury, an appropriation in money of upwards of a million of dollars for one or two States only, and here was an amendment which measured out something like equal justice to others of the States, and he was even denied a hearing on it. Now this did not appear to him to be either courteous or correct; but it was for the Senate to decide the question, and to them he would leave it without further remark.

Mr. SEVIER opposed the amendment: was against acting on it without the necessary surveys and estimates were furnished. He had some little acquaintance with this bill himself, though not so long as the Senator from Missouri, because he had not been so long in public life. But he had always seen that when any specific object was in view, that surveys were made, and the estimates furnished. The question was, shall we embark in it or not? If it was considered beneficial in a national point of view, like the motion before us, and an appropriation was made, it was generally considered that we were bound to go on with it, and the appropriations were made from time to time; but in the case of the amendment, we were asked to attach it to a bill belonging to an exclusive object, without surveys, estimates, or any thing to guide us in our research. He appealed to the Senator not to embarrass the bill, by insisting upon his amendment. Mr. S. said he had no objection that the Senator should obtain what he could for purposes of internal improvements, and we all had, he presumed, the same object in view; and he (Mr. S.) certainly would not be very nice about getting all he could for his own State. He had objected to the amendment of the Senator, not because he was opposed to the principles of the amendment, but because it sought to attach to the bill before them, which had one specific object in view, crude and undigested subjects, that might prove fatal to its passage.

Mr. KING could not but admire the exceeding liberality of the honorable Senator from Arkansas. The gentleman went for appropriation after appropriation for roads in Arkansas, because he said they were "roads commenced and not completed." We appropriated the other day, said Mr. K. for roads in Arkansas, and they were called military roads, because they lead to a temporary garrison, which the Secretary of War may abandon at his pleasure. But, continued Mr. K. when we tried to get a small appropriation for a military road in Alabama, on which twenty thousand dollars had been expended, we could not get it either on the plea of its having been commenced and not completed, or of its being a military road. We were told, said he, that it was altogether unconstitutional; that when the appropriation was first made it was rightly done, because the road was in the Indian country, but that now the Indian title was extinguished, the State of Alabama must make the road herself. He then tried to get the road out of the two per cent. fund belonging to his State, but this appropriation of a few thousand was refused, on the ground that the two per cent. fund was to be reserved for making roads leading to the State, and this was within it

Now where was the evidence that this Cumberland road in the State of Illinois, for which the bill appropriated $300,000, was now commenced? Have you not heard the difficulty which sprung up this morning between the Senators from Missouri and Illinois, as to the location of the road? Was it a road commenced when they did not know where it was to be? Because that was called the Cumberland road, and was commenced from the two per cent. fund, gentlemen seemed to be forgetting all constitutional scruples with regard to it. But how much beyond the two per cent. fund had been expended on it? At least ten times as much. There never was so extravagant an expenditure of the public money, as had been made on some parts of this road, and such a road as some considerable portion of it was not to be seen in any country. Several years ago, when the Senator from Kentucky took part in the debate on this road bill, he showed that it was not possible to construct an important part of it, without such an expense that ought not to be thought of. He showed conclusively, from the nature of the soil, and the scarcity and dearness of materials, that it would involve an expense that ought not to be encountered. The Senate, therefore, limited the appropriation to the opening of the road. Now they were called on for these heavy appropriations, without knowing where this road was to go, or what further expenses it would involve

Whether it was in the end to go to Texas, or across the Rocky Mountains, and terminate at the mouth of the Columbia river, they did not yet know. He had looked at this Cumberland road for many years. It was an old offender against the Constitution and law of the land; so much so, that gentlemen who supported it had no means to satisfy their constitutional scruples but by putting a direct fraud in the bill. A clause in the bill declared that the appropriation was to be paid out of the two per cent. reserved for making roads to these States, when it was notorious that every dollar of this fund had been long ago exhausted, and that there would not be another dollar of it for a hundred years to come. He was sorry that he was obliged to treat the subject in this manner; but the proposition of his friend from Michigan, (Mr. NORVELL) so reasonable and so just in itself, having been met at the outset with such strenuous objections, he thought it right to inquire into the propriety of continuing the bounty of the Government to two or three States, and refusing it to others, who had received nothing. With his ideas of the constitutional principle involved, he was compelled to announce at once that he should vote against this bill; but yet he wished to see an amendment made to it, which would be doing something like equal justice. The original object in view was to get across the mountains; and when that was done, it ought not to have gone farther.

Mr. WALKER was glad to find that the Senator from Alabama had taken up the subject. It was not in that State alone that the two per cent. fund had been drained, not for making roads in the State, but leading to the State. When the two States of Alabama and Mississippi wanted an appropriation for internal improvement, it was voted down in the Senate, and now we see (said Mr. W.) two or three States, that have received donations of millions of acres for purposes of internal improvement, calling upon an exhausted Treasury for a million of dollars, which we should have to borrow. He wished the Senate to look at the enormity of such a measure, and the prejudicial bearing it would have upon the whole Confederacy. The people of Alton and St. Louis were quarreling about the point at which the road should pass, and by and by we should have the same disputes about passing Texas or the Rocky Mountains. If the Senate did not check it now, it would never stop. Mr. W. contended that the bill contained an open fraud on its face, by attempting to show that the money was to be repaid from the two per cent. fund, which, according to a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, was less than half a million of dollars, and would never exceed one million and a half; and yet we had already appropriated seven millions on this two per cent. and now one more was asked for, making eight millions, to be refunded out of a fund that never could do it. The bill was a palpable fraud upon the very face of the documents, and yet we were called upon to vote for it. The system, said Mr. W. if carried out, would be partial and unjust in all its bearings; it was not a national object, but was for the benefit, at most, of three or four States, for which his constituents were taxed from year to year, and the money taken out of their pockets. Mr. W. said it was partial, iniquitous, and unjust, and he, for one, would never see injustice or inequality prevail without lifting his voice against them.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said this was the old opposition renewed with a laudable zeal. The gentlemen from Alabama and Mississippi had opposed the bill on constitutional grounds, and its friends had no right, therefore, to expect their support. His views were directly the reverse of theirs, and he should feel himself bound to vote for it. Mr. S. said he concurred entirely with the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) that the bill should stand on its own bottom, and not have any thing extraneous attached to it. He had not examined the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, and would not, therefore, be considered as opposing it on its merits, but simply because it embraced objects new in themselves, and in no wise connected with the plain and simple matter before them. If, whenever the Senator from Michigan should see fit to introduce a bill relating to any important improvement in his State, that Senator would always find him willing to give the measure his cordial support; and he hoped the amendment would be withdrawn, and that the bill would not be further postponed.

Mr. SEVIER observed that when he was up before, he had no idea of a discussion on the merits of the Cumberland road. He had given his reasons why the Senator from Michigan should not press his amendment at this time, and the Senator from Alabama, in replying to the remarks he made, referred he hoped not ironically, to his exceeding liberality. He could say with sincerity that there was no Senator whose good opinion he was more desirous of retaining than that of the Senator from Alabama, and he had always relied on him as the best authority for the construction of the rules and the order of proceeding in the Senate. The Senator, in the course of his remarks, had brought up the old subject of the Alabama road, and he would, therefore, inquire why that measure had not before this been brought before the Senate in the proper form. Neither the Senator himself, nor his colleague, nor the Alabama delegation in the other House, had ever thought of bringing it up except in the manner just done to embarrass the bill before them.

Now, he asked the Senator if this was consistent with liberality? The Senators from Mississippi and Alabama talked much about the two per cent. fund, and, with a commendable zeal in favor of the interests of their own States, complained that they could not have roads out of it within their States. But where was the hardship of the case? It was a bargain, and no one had a right to complain of it. Again, the Senator said that the insertion of a clause in the Cumberland Road bill, that the appropriations were to be reimbursed out of the two per cent. fund, was a palpable fraud, because the fund has been long ago expended; and it, therefore, never can be reimbursed. He would ask his brother Jackson men how this clause came to be in the bill? He had voted against it, and it was struck out; but, on the bill being sent to the other House, it was ascertained that it would be vetoed without the clause; and it was, therefore, put in there by way of amendment; and, coming back to the Senate, passed through, notwithstanding the constitutional scruples of gentlemen who had before voted against it. General Jackson, the great Apollo of the South, required it to hold the States to their bargain, and it was put in to remove his constitutional scruples and to sooth the consciences of his friends. To say, therefore, that this clause was a palpable fraud, came with a bad grace from gentlemen on that side, when it was put in to satisfy their constitutional scruples. He would ask the Senator if the clause was not struck out, and again inserted in the way he had stated?

[Mr. KING. The gentleman will find my vote against it however.]

Mr. SEVIER continued. The gentleman from Alabama announced his constitutional objections to the bill, and that he should vote against it in any event; why, therefore, did he insist on tacking this amendment to it? He was surprised that the Senator, who was so particular in his adhering to rules and established customs, should be willing to bring in an appropriation of the importance of that in the amendment, without estimates, without surveys, and without any information whatever on the subject. Suppose (said Mr. S.) we pass the bill with this amendment. It will go the other House and be stopped there, because that body never will pass an appropriation, without having the estimates, and all other necessary information before them. And more: the President who professes to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor will veto the bill, because it contains new objects, and then we shall have no Cumberland road at all. As to borrowing money, which was so much dreaded by the Senator from Mississippi, he saw nothing so very alarming in it. We had borrowed money before, and if it was for a proper object, there would be no harm in borrowing it again.

Mr. NORVELL said it was a little extraordinary to him that the Senator from Arkansas should talk about surveys and estimates, and old and new roads, when the proposition was not for the construction of a road, but for a grant of land to certain of the new States for the purposes of internal improvement, who had hitherto received nothing of the kind—a grant which had been made several times before. When he made the proposition to amend the bill, it was done in good faith; and, if the amendment prevailed, he should vote for the bill, provided the clause about reimbursement was stricken out. But he could not, consistently with his ideas of justice, vote for it without the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG was against the adoption of the amendment. The course pursued by gentlemen was of a very extraordinary nature—a kind of dog and manger policy. Because they could not get what they wanted, they would vote against the bill. Such a proceeding was suicidal. The whole country had been more or less benefited by the Cumberland road, and he hoped gentlemen would not now seek to embarrass or defeat it.

The little dispute about the point of crossing, between the people of Alton and St. Louis, had been adverted to as a source of objection; but in his opinion that had no connection with the matter before the Senate, and could at any time be adjusted by the people of their respective States, without trouble. Mr. Y. contended that the measure was one of peculiar benefit, in which a great portion of the States were interested, and spoke of the wide extended prairies of the West, through which the roads were at times almost impassable. Mr. Y. concluded his remarks by expressing an earnest wish that gentlemen would not pursue a policy so unwise and so illiberal.

Mr. WALKER replied that there could be no more just groundsfor voting against an appropriation than because it was unequal. If the appropriation was for the benefit of the whole Union, it would be a different affair; but it was rather unreasonable for twenty-three States to be told that they are wanting in liberality and public spirit, because they vote against a monopoly. In other words, that, notwithstanding this monopoly ex sts, they should be asked to tax their constituents and take the money out of their pockets for the purpose of perpetrating this system of monopoly, was asking more of these States than they could reasonably be expected to grant.

After some remarks from Mr. MORRIS,

At the suggestion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, the amendment was ordered to be printed, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, February 22, 1838.

Mr. HOWARD moved that the bill in relation to the neutrality be made the special order at one o'clock every day till disposed of; but the vote being ayes 70, noes 23, no quorum—

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House: but

Mr. HOWARD modified his motion by limiting it to one o'clock this day, remarking that a quorum was obviously present; which was agreed to.

The first business in order was the consideration of the Senate bill providing for the legal adjudication and settlement of the claims for land under grants of the Baron Bastrop and others in Louisiana, and of sundry persons in Arkansas, reported yesterday from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana had moved the recommitment of the bill to the same committee, with instructions to report some bill to settle these claims.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana now moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PICKENS moved to commit it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After some remarks from Messrs. JOHNSON, HARLAN, PICKENS, REED, MERCER, CHAMBERS, BOON, LAWLER, and LOOMIS,

Mr. TOLAND moved to recommit the bill back to the Committee on Private Land Claims, with instructions to make a written report upon the subject, with a view of ascertaining the opinions of that committee on the subject.

After some further remarks by Mr. PICKENS,

The original motion, to commit to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow, was agreed to—86 to 45.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner on Pensions, transmitting the papers in support of the claim of Benjamin Durfee.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, on leave, laid on the table an amendment he proposed to submit to the bill providing for the support of the West Point Academy, when said bill should come up for consideration; which was ordered to be printed.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The house then took up the special order, being the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved the 20th of April, 1818."

The question pending was on agreeing to the modified amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, to the first section of the bill, which was reconsidered on yesterday, as stated before in the Globe.

Mr. TOUCEY said it had been objected that the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States came into conflict with this bill as to the right of seizure. He apprehended, however, that there was no foundation for this objection, as, in his opinion, the fourth article applied merely to general search warrants, and had no application to the kind of seizures referred to in this bill. He supposed the case of an embargo law being passed, would any one doubt that the officers of the Government would have a right to seize vessels about to violate that law. Again: in the case of goods about to be smuggled, would there be any doubt of the right of Government officers to seize the goods. This was his idea in relation to this article of the Constitution of the United States on this subject. But he must protest against this amendment which had been introduced by the gentleman from New York, and which was now under consideration, because he looked upon it as being utterly repugnant to every principle of our Government, and to all our institutions.

The Constitution of the United States declares that the right of the people to bear arms shall remain inviolate. Then how does this amendment apply to the case? and how are the people to be secured in their right to bear arms, if this amendment passed. Why, if this amendment was adopted, any citizen of the United States who might be found with arms or munitions of war in his possession, and he expressed an intention of using them in carrying on hostilities in a conterminous country, he is guilty of a high crime by your law, and subject to fine and imprisonment. Not only this, but if he has any wagon, vessel, or vehicle of any description, and he says he is going to use those vehicles in carrying on any war in a conterminous territory, they are liable to seizure, and the person is liable to a fine of $3,000, and imprisonment for three years.

These were the principles of this amendment, and these were principles which he entirely detested and abhorred, and he protested against this kind of legislation. Further than this, the amendment under consideration would apply in a most odious manner to persons emigrating from this country to a country conterminous with our country. If a citizen of this country should attempt to pass from this country to Mexico or Texas, and hostility should be going on there, he might have his property seized, and himself fined and imprisoned under the provisions of this section, as it was proposed now to amend it. Further than this, every citizen of the United States on the frontier who might have arms or ammunition in his possession, and might express an intention of using them in the prosecution of hostilities in a conterminous country, he would be subject to the penalties provided in this section.

Again: if Mexico should invade Texas, and a citizen of Texas in this country should attempt to go home to his own country to defend his own soil, he would be subject to the penalties of this bill, and thrown into jail. If, on the other hand, Texas should invade Mexico, and any citizen from Mexico should attempt to go from this country to defend his country, he would be held liable to fine and imprisonment. Again: if any Canadian or any subject of the King of Great Britain, who might be in this country, should attempt to go home while hostilities were going on there, he would be subject to the penalties here imposed. He contended, if this bill was passed, as it was attempted to amend it, and it was attempted to carry out its provisions, that it would involve us in interminable difficulties

The act of 1818, in his opinion, went far enough, and as far as any act ought to go, and he would not consent to go beyond the principle contained in that law, and the principles under which we had acted, without being involved in difficulties, for the last half century. The bill of the Senate was drawn up with an eye to these principles, and so far as it went, he was willing to go, but no further. That bill was framed with great caution and wisdom, and he hoped there might be found a majority of the House who would be willing to unite upon the Senate bill, and pass it. Furthermore, he hoped it might be passed to-day, and the subject be disposed of, as there were other matters of great moment which it was necessary to have acted upon speedily. There was a bill with regard to the abatement of suits brought by and against the late Bank of the United States, which it was all important should be passed before the fourth of March next.

Mr. UNDERWOOD opposed both the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York and the original bill, as a measure entirely improper to be adopted by this country. By the provisions of this bill, he expected that, in case of difficulties between Mexico and Texas, the citizens of the West might be prohibited from trading in horses and mules, as well as arms and ammunition, with the people of Texas or Mexico. It might also prevent emigration from the South and West to those countries, or it may prevent emigration from the United States to Canada. Suppose a party of a hundred families going from the West to Texas, of course they would take their rifles and ammunition with them. Then, if your United States officer met them, and asked them what use they were going to make of the arms they were taking with them, and they said they would use them to carry on a war with Mexico, in case their rights were invaded, they would be subject to arrest and imprisonment by this bill.

It was nothing more nor less than a bill to trammel trade and commerce, and he hoped every gentleman who was in favor of a free trade upon the principles laid down in the laws of nations, would oppose it. He maintained that it was the right of the citizens of the United States to carry on a trade with any country that had a war raging within her borders; and he maintained further, that if there were two hostile armies at the present time in Canada, (the one on the one side of one of their great rivers, and the other on the other side,) we had a perfect right to trade with both, and furnish both with bread and beef, without, in any manner, compromiting our neutrality. This bill imposed penalties which were never thought of at any former time in our history. It would impose a penalty on the citizens of a foreign country who might be driven into this country by the stress of circumstances with arms in their hands. Such persons were liable to be seized, fined, and imprisoned.

Now this was a monstrous principle; and he hoped never to see it carried into execution in this country. Suppose the case of two European nations being engaged in carrying on a maritime war, and one of the fleets should be driven into the harbor of New York by a superior force. Would you seize that fleet, and hold the officers and seamen guilty of a high crime, and fine and imprison them? He thought not. It would be our duty to protect them, whilst in our waters. Again: suppose a superior force at Malden should drive out a part of the inhabitants who might be in arms, and those inhabitants of that place should take refuge in Detroit; would you seize upon them? hold them guilty of a high crime, and subject them to a fine and imprisonment? Was this the principle you were about to establish? If it was, he must say that he utterly detested any such principle.

The British authorities in Canada went upon the principle of protection so far that they gave protection to all our renegado slaves who escaped and went within their dominions, and why should we be prevented from giving protection to the oppressed of their people. As this bill had undergone so many phases, he hoped that it might yet undergo a total eclipse, because it was a measure which he believed calculated to do very great injury to the people of this country. He had no idea of making a law of this kind, which was only to apply to conterminous countries, and thought if any bill of the kind was passed, that it ought to be general in its character. With the view of testing this question, whether the House was disposed to legislate solely with reference to conterminous territories, he moved to strike out the words "conterminous with the United States."

Mr. ROBETSON inquired of the Chair, whether it would now be in order to move to recommit this bill with all the amendments to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIR replied that this motion would be in order.

Mr. ROBERTSON then said that before he made this motion, he would beg leave to submit a few remarks to the House, for the purpose of showing that there was no necessity for precipitation, in relation to this bill, if there was any necessity for legislation at all. The crisis he apprehended had passed; yesterday or to-day the great event was to have occurred, which this bill was intended to have prevented. Then, as the crisis itself had passed away, why should the House precipitate itself into measures of this kind, which seemed to him to be utterly repugnant to every principle of constitutional liberty.

He would ask if there was any member of the House prepared to give his vote on this bill to-day, coupled, as it was, with some eight or ten amendments, some of which have just been laid upon the tables of members, and without knowing how the bill will read if any of these amendments be adopted? He thought it would be proper that this bill should go back to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in order that they might make it more conformable to the views of the majority of the House, if it was intended that it should pass at all; but he believed that no legislation was necessary upon this question. He believed the law of 1818 was amply sufficient for the present occasion, and that there was no danger of war, and there would be no cause of complaint from Great Britain in case we refused to legislate further on the subject.

He referred to the provisions of the act of 1818, and showed that it provided for the prevention of all military expeditions against any country with which we might be at peace. He also contended that the power proposed to be invested in officers of the United States was too great and dangerous to the liberties of the people. He had no idea of having the President or the Secretary of the Treasury directing their subordinate officers to violate the rights of the citizens. Mr. R. addressed the House at some length in support of the position he had taken; and concluded by moving that the bill and amendments be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. REED was in favor of recommitting for one purpose, at least, that of amending the bill, and especially that part of it providing for seizures.

Mr. HAYNES had objected several days ago to the recommitment of the bill, or rather its commitment to the committee on the Union, and his opposition arose from the very strong doubts upon his mind whether any time would be gained or saved, nor did he now believe any economy of time would be the result at present, for he believed they were as well qualified and as well prepared to discuss it, and to bring it to some determination, pro or con, then as after another reference. When reported back, it would still be subject to the same embarrassment, with reference to the various propositions to amend, as it was now, and he was, therefore, opposed to the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOWARD said if he thought it possible that the committee could be governed by the opinions of the House, so as to frame the bill acceptable to it, he would cheerfully accede to its recommitment; but those opinions could not be ascertained unless the House voted on some of the amendments. Moreover, the committee had reported precisely what gentlemen said they would, viz: a distinct measure; and, unless the House would take a vote on some of the propositions, the Committee on Foreign Affairs could not possibly ascertain the wishes of the House.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested to the mover to change the proposed committee to that on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought the subject so properly within the sphere of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that he could not vary his motion.

Mr. PATTON could see no possible good to be gained by recommitting the bill, and urged the House either to adopt or reject some of the amendments.

Mr. BELL said that the Executive power having asked for more power, the refusal to grant it would, or might, lead the borderers to infer that Congress was indisposed to restrain them, and would encourage them in acts of violation. In this way the House might go on debating till they found themselves brought to the issue of voting actually for or against a war. He was in favor of passing some measure, and he was not very particular as to the details. Mr. B. then moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report the following as a substitute, which was the same Mr. EVERETT had given notice of his intention to move yesterday, in the following modified form:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That if any person, after the President of the United States shall have, by his proclamation, declared that an insurrection, or hostilities exist, or that there is imminent danger thereof, within the territory, or dominions of any foreign State or colony conterminous with the United States, with which the United States are at peace, shall, within the United States, or any territory belonging to the same, fit out any vessel of war, or purchase, procure, or collect any arms or munitions of war, with intent that the same shall be used or employed in exciting, aiding, or carrying on such hostilities within any such foreign State or colony, such vessel, arms, and munitions of war shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to be seized and proceeded against in the manner provided by law for the seizure and condemnation of goods forfeited for being imported in violation of the revenue laws: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any customary trade with such foreign State or colony.

Mr. MERCER was not opposed to the object of the bill; but he contended that it was unnecessary, the existing law being sufficiently comprehensive to meet the exigency of the present case, and ample in all its provisions.

Mr. WISE said the modification of the gentleman from Tennessee presented the bill in its most objectionable form; but he was opposed to every and any extension of the law of 1818. Mr. W. then went on to contrast the course of the Government in the case of Canada and that of Texas. In the latter, the violations and disregard of our neutral relations with Mexico were open and notorious, whereas, in the case of Canada, they were about to anticipate a possible collision. He insisted that the act of 1818, so far from being deficient of power, went further than he would go, if such a measure were proposed to be enacted now. It provided for every possible case that could arise, and the President's excuse of his want of power under it was not a valid one.

The bill under consideration proposed to invest precisely the same Executive arbitrary power upon the President and upon his minions too, as the alien act which had been frowned down in its day, and condemned by posterity, though the latter was aimed against aliens endeavoring to embroil this country with either France or England, while the present bill was intended to punish our own citizens for taking part in a foreign collision. Mr. W. then went on at length to oppose the bill, and declared that nothing could ever induce him to vote.

Mr. PATTON, obtained the floor, but gave way to numerous calls for an adjournment, though opposed to it himself; and

Mr. GRAVES making the motion, it prevailed, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 22, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented the preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the Sub-Treasury bill, and urging the necessity of a National Bank: read, printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a communication from the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of New York, enclosing certain resolutions adopted by that body, in opposition to the Sub-Treasury bill; which, after some remarks from Mr. T. were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Jonathan Crow; and a bill for the relief of John McLeod; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Thompson.

Mr. LINN, on leave, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to purchase the right to use the vapor bath of Doctor Boyd Reilly; which was read twice, and referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the Chair.

The resolution introduced by Mr. LINN, appropriating the circular gallery exclusively to ladies, was taken up, and agreed to.

The resolution submitted by Mr. NICHOLAS, directing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for a survey of the coast of Louisiana, from the Balize to the mouth of the Sabine, was taken up.

Mr. KING expressed some astonishment that this very important coast had not been surveyed long since. He spoke of its importance in a commercial point of view; it was a long line of coast, on which smuggling could be carried on to an almost indefinite extent. Mr. K. said, when the subject came before him, he should cheerfully give it his earliest attention.

The resolution was accordingly adopted.

On motion of Mr. KING, the resolution laid on the table some days ago for distributing certain copies of the Land laws and American State Papers, now in the hands of the Secretary, was taken up, and, after a brief explanation, agreed to.

The report of the Committee on Finance unfavorable to the petition of Theodore Bicknell and George F——, and the report of the same committee unfavorable to the petition of Jacob Baker, were severally considered and concurred in.

The report of the Committee on Indian Affairs unfavorable to the claim of Caleb Atwater; and

The report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims unfavorable to the petition of William Baily's heirs, were also severally considered and concurred in.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill to amend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company, were considered and agreed to.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committ e of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of the heirs and devizees of Dr. Gustavus Horner, late surgeon's mate in the army of the Revolution;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. William Ramsey, deceased;

The bill for the relief of John Spitfarrow;

The bill for the relief of Albion T. Crow;

The bill for the relief of Joseph Hall;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenat Wm. Rushworm, deceased, and

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Hawkins, deceased.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

At one o'clock the Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, as the order of the day; when

Mr. CRITTENDEN rose, and addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, concluding his speech at near three o'clock; when

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Feb. 23, 1838.

Mr. HOWARD moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of proceeding, at one o'clock, to the consideration of the neutrality bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were, yeas 90, nays 38.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky, in behalf of Mr. MURRAY, detained from the House by indisposition, presented several petitions.

Mr. LAWLER moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill in relation to the Bastrop claims, and to refer the same to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

When this committee was called,

Mr. PICKENS rose, and said he desired to know of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the House was to expect a report and bill upon the subject of the currency, and upon the regulation and disbursement of the public funds; and also when they were to expect it, and what they had to look for on that subject? Mr. P. propounded the interrogatory most respectfully, because the subject was one on which the country was deeply and vitally interested, and, in his opinion, ought to be met with promptness, and decided. It was due to the House and to the country.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would cheerfully respond to the inquiry, and state that the Committee of Ways and Means would have reported on that subject at an earlier period of this session, but for the absence of two of their members, and their desire to have a full committee on the consideration of a subject of so much importance. They would, however, be prepared to report early next week, perhaps by Tuesday or Wednesday, and would bring in a bill accompanied by a detailed report on the subject.

Mr. C. also took that opportunity to notify the House that, as soon as the appropriation bills were disposed of, he should ask it to take up the important and urgent subject embraced in the gentleman's inquiry.

COMMERCE.

Mr. TOLAND reported a bill for the relief of James Selden.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMAS gave notice that as soon as the bill in relation to the frontier was disposed of, it was his intention, under instructions to that effect from the Judiciary Committee, to ask the House to take up and consider the bill to prevent the abatement of suits in which the late Bank of the United States is a party.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. McKAY reported Senate bill, with sundry amendments, entitled an act to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCLELLAN of Tennessee reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Bloom.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia reported a bill restoring the name of John Davis to the pension roll.

Also, a bill restoring the name of John Cathron to the pension roll.

Mr. EWING reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Becker.

Mr. KLINGENSMITH reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Grist.

Also, a bill for the relief of Mary Phelps.

INVALID PENSIONS

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York reported a bill for the relief of Oliver Dorsett.

Mr. AYCRIGG reported a bill for the relief of Captain James Hunt.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr LINCOLN reported a resolution instructing this committee to inquire into the expediency of enclosing and planting the public grounds now lying waste between Pennsylvania avenue and the Potomac river; which was concurred in.

Mr. REED asked leave to offer a resolution granting the use of the hall to the Congressional Temperance Society on Tuesday evening next; objection being made,

Mr. R moved a suspension of the rule, and first asked for the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew the call, and upon a count the rules were suspended, 91 to 38.

Mr. BOON asked for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution, but they were not ordered, and the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, communicating a report from the Commissioner on Pensions, in answer to a resolution of the House in the case of Noel Parker; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

The House then took up the special order, being the "Act to amend an act, entitled 'An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned,' approved the 20th of April, 1818."

The question pending was on agreeing to the modified amendment of Mr. LOOMIS, to the first section of the bill, which was reconsidered, as stated heretefore in the Globe.

Mr. ROBERTSON had moved to recommit the bill, and all the amendments, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. BELL to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to report the following as a substitute, which was the same Mr. EVERETT had given notice of his intention to move yesterday, in the following modified form:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That if any person, after the President of the United States shall have, by his proclamation, declared that an insurrection, or hostilities exist, or that there is imminent danger thereof, within the territory or dominions of any foreign State or colony conterminous with the United States, with which the United States are at peace, shall, within the United States, or any territory belonging to the same, fit out any vessel of war, or purchase, procure, or collect any arms or munitions of war, with intent that the same shall be used or employed in exciting, aiding, or carrying on such hostilities within any such foreign State or colony, such vessel, arms, and munitions of war shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to be seized and proceeded against in the manner provided by law for the seizure and condemnation of goods forfeited for being imported in violation of the revenue laws: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any customary trade with such foreign State or colony.

Mr. PATTON thought the bill and amendments were sufficiently understood to take the vote upon it, without referring it the Committee of the Whole, as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL.) He thought, therefore, that the better plan would be for the House to take the vote, in order to see whether the House preferred the original bill or the amendment under consideration to the one which had been brought to the notice of the body by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. EVERETT.) This, in his opinion, would be the better course to pursue; and then, if the House refused to adopt the amendments proposed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOOMIS) and himself, the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont would be next in order, and the House could then adopt it in case a majority were satisfied with it. But as the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELL,) who had manifested a disposition to sustain the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the enactment of some bill for the purpose of preserving our neutrality, and as the gentleman had shown himself so favorably disposed towards the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, he would undertake to show the gentleman that its provisions were far more objectionable than the amendments proposed by the gentleman from New York and himself.

That amendment was, by far, more rigorous than the amendment he had alluded to, which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) had so much denounced. Both of these amendments were obnoxious to the constitutional objections which had been made by several gentlemen; but the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont was by far the most objectionable, because it made the property of the citizen irrepleviable until the matter was litigated upon. Then, by this amendment, the property of the innocent citizen may be seized, and held in the hands of the Government officer until the question has gone through a regular legal trial, without there being any possibility of relief for him. Does this recommend the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont to the gentleman from Tennessee, and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE)? Now the only new provision which the Committee on Foreign Affairs had introduced, was giving the President power to relieve the property of the citizen when it was, in his opinion, wrongfully taken. It was in the nature of the pardoning power. It was giving him power, when he became satisfied that no offence had been committed by the citizen, to restore the property which may have been seized. This was the difference between the amendment of the gentleman from New York, in connection with the amendment submitted by himself, and the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont; and it seemed to him that it must be apparent to the House that these amendments were infinitely more mild than the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont.

With respect to the argument of several gentlemen, that this bill violated the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, he thought it had been sufficiently answered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr LEGARE.) But gentlemen had admitted that cases might arise where warrants might be dispensed with, and when they admitted this, they, in his opinion, conceded the whole ground.

Mr. WISE said that he had drawn a distinction with respect to seizures merely on suspicion of crime.

Mr. PATTON knew that many gentlemen had attempted to draw nice distinctions, but they were such distinctions as reminded him of the man in the play, who would not tie on his cravat without due process being issued to that effect from the squire.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) had made constitutional objections to this bill, which, it seemed to him, were not well founded.

Mr. THOMPSON explained that the constitutional distinction which he had drawn was this: that an arrest might be made without a warrant, but no seizure of property could be made without due course of law.

Mr. PATTON proceeded. Did not the gentleman perceive that the Constitution applied as much to the one case as the other? The provision is, "that no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." There was no such distinction as the gentleman had drawn; and this whole argument had been set te rights, as he had before stated, by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LEGARE.)

Mr. P. then replied to the remarks of various gentlemen, with regard to the Executive appointing tools and minions to interfere with the rights of the citizens, and contended that they had strangely perverted the salutary principles upon which every Government must act. What, he asked, was the authority proposed to be given to the Executive by this bill? It was nothing more nor less than an authority to direct certain United States officers to perform certain duties; and if they were insufficient to perform them, to appoint others to aid them. It was merely an authority to appoint a set of special constables, to carry into effect the laws.

Mr. ROBERTSON would inquire of the gentleman if there was any clause in the Constitution which authorized the President to appoint special constables?

Mr. PATTON would reply to his colleague, by asking him if there was any thing in the Consitution or laws of Virginia to authorize the sheriffs to appoint bailiffs and assistants. He believed there was not yet this power is exercised by every sheriff, every constable, and by the watchmen of your cities in the night, for the purpose of preserving the peace and order of society. This was a power which must necessarily be exercised by all officers on particular emergencies, in order to carry into execution the laws which were enacted by your Legislative bodies. He then replied to his colleague, (Mr. WISE,) with respect to the exception which he had taken, relative to the arrest of citizens on suspicion. This was a thing which in a Government like ours every man was subject to. His colleague must know that he was now subject to be arrested upon the oath of the greatest vagabond which might happen to be in the land, and all that was in it, was that he would have his remedy in damages, if he was wrongfully arrested.

Mr. WISE here again explained, and begged to call the attention of his colleague to the distinction between these cases of arrest. In the one case, the arrest was made on the oath of an individual complaining on behalf of some injury done, or supposed to be done, to himself, and the matter was taken before a judicial officer; but, in the other, the complaint was made on behalf of another. The person who made the complaint was both the accuser and the judge in the case.

Mr. PATTON thought the gentleman's distinction was a distinction without a difference. The seizure was made under the provisions of this bill, by an Executive officer—by an officer of the law. So that, in both cases, there was an officer of the law to take cognizance of the matter. This whole matter, he took it, was in accordance with the long settled principles of our Government from its foundation, and he apprehended that it was not so objectionable as many gentlemen imagined. He next replied to the arguments of his colleague, (Mr. WISE,) who had denounced this bill as another alien and sedition bill. Mr. P. contended that there was no analogy between the provisions of this bill and the alien and sedition law, and went into an examination of the various provisions of that law, in order to show that he was correct in what he had stated.

After some explanatory remarks by Messrs. WISE and ROBERTSON,

Mr. PATTON said that he would not go into the discussion with regard to Mexico and Texas at this time, which had been so frequently brought in while this bill was under discussion. "Sufficient for the day was the evil thereof." It would be sufficient for him to enter into that matter when it was brought fairly before the House. He did not know whether there was any hostile feeling on the part of the President towards Mexico, or any favorable feeling towards Texas, but he knew there was but little of that feeling prevailing in this House.

With regard to the insinuations or imputations which had been thrown out, that this Government pursued one policy towards Mexico and another towards Great Britain, he thought there was no foundation for it. He believed this country had never been disposed to disregard the rights of Mexico, and, on the other hand, she would not play the part of the truckling coward to Great Britain. He believed this nation would be as ready to assert and maintain her rights against a Government of Europe as against any other Government.

Mr. TAYLOR spoke at some length on the merits of the various propositions. A sketch of his remarks will be given, from the Reporter's notes, in to-morrow's paper.

Mr. HOWARD said it was necessary to pass some measure, and that promptly, and he had risen to do what appeared to be the wish of many gentlemen of the House for the last day or two, and effect some compromise of the various opinions and propositions that had been heard and submitted. Mr. H. had accordingly prepared a proposition, which was read to the House for information. It was in the form of a substitute for the whole bill, and was then so moved by Mr. H.

To this Mr. DUNN submitted an amendment, and

The subject was further debated by Messrs. MARVIN, MAXWELL, FILLMORE, DUNN, McKAY, HAYNES, ROBERTSON, and WISE.

Mr. BELL modified his motion by accepting of the amendment of Mr. HOWARD, excepting the proviso.

Mr. DUNN then renewed his amendment.

After some remarks by Messrs. MERCER and ADAMS,

On motion of Mr. SAWYER,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, February 23, 1838.

Mr. WALL presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Atlantic county, New Jersey, praying a survey of the inlet of Great Egg harbor: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial from Digby Smith, praying that the lighthouses on the coast may be lighted on the plan invented by a certain citizen of Great Britain: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial from six hundred citizens of Highland county, Ohio, remonstrating against the course pursued by the misguided and fanatical zeal of certain of their citizens in relation to abolition petitions. The petitioners pray that the Senate will not act in conformity with the wishes of these misguided and deluded people, nor interfere in any way with the delicate and subsisting rights of the Southern States, or the rights of a similar character subsisting in the District of Columbia. They pray, also, that Congress will not heed the prayer of these fanatics, who now seek to rescind the resolutions offered by Mr. Calhoun, but that they be suffered to re main on the journal as the true interpreters of the great political compact: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Robert Grignon, praying the payment of a sum of money secured to him by a provision of a treaty with the Menomonee Indians: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PRESTON presented the memorial of B. F. Hand and G. Longstreet, praying compensation for extra services for carrying the mail: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Buffalo, New York, praying the construction of a harbor at Milwaukie, Wisconsin Territory: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial, which he represented as a long and able one, from the citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that a navy yard, depot, and dry dock may be constructed at that city: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. McKEAN presented five memorials from citizens of Philadelphia city and county, and one from citizens of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Also, six memorials from citizens of Philadelphia city and county, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPENCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the Medical Society of the city of Washington: ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Isabella Hall and others; which was read twice, and referred.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

Bill for the relief of the heirs of John Hawkins, deceased.

Bill for the relief of the heirs of William Russum, deceased.

Bill for the relief of John Spitfathom.

Bill for the relief of the heirs of Doctor William Ramsay, deceased.

Bill for the relief of the devisees and heirs of Dr. Gustavus Horner, late surgeon's mate in the Revolutionary army.

Bill for the relief of Robert Hickey, of New York.

Bill for the relief of Joseph Hall.

Bill for the relief of Albion T. Crow.

On motion of Mr TIPTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the expediency of placing Abram Goble, of Indiana, on the roll of invalid pensioners of the United States, in consequence of disability, occasioned by a wound received by him at Fort Montgomery, New York, in the year 1777.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to the Senate as follows:

1st. The number of acres of land that have been granted for all purposes by the General Government to the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Michigan and Arkansas, including the lands granted to them while Territories, designating the purpose of the grant, and the number of acres granted to each.

2d. The number of acres of public lands that have been sold in each of the States aforesaid at public or private sale, and the average price produced by the sale per acre, and the number of acres remaining unsold in each of the States aforesaid, including all the lands within those States, and designating between those lands to which the Indian title has been extinguished and those held by the Indians.

3d. The whole number of acres of public land in the State of Indiana that has been sold by the Government and the amount received from the sale.

Mr. NORVELL said he had no objection to the resolution, but would like to so modify it, as to include the quantity sold at private sale as well as at auction.

Mr. KING would suggest that the resolution be made to read at "public and private sale," the document he thought would be rather voluminous, and much of the information, at least two-thirds, he believed might be found in other documents.

Mr. SMITH said he would assent to any modification desired by the gentlemen. His object was to have all the information embodied in one document.

The Committee on Pensions made an unfavorable report on the petitions of Andrew Bean, Thomas Cogswell, Nathan Grantham, and Alpheus Whetmore.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the report of A. Whetmore was ordered to lie on the table, and the others were severally concurred in.

Mr. WALKER would have no objection to the resolution, but that every particle of the information would be found in the documents already before the Senate. The Senator from Indiana would find a large portion of it in a detailed report made by the Commissioner of the Land Office. He could, therefore, see no necessity for its being furnished again; on the contrary, there would be a manifest impropriety in calling on the Department again.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he was not aware that the information had been furnished; he would, therefore, let the resolution lie for the present, until he could examine for himself.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to take up the Senate bill for the relief of Robert McCauley; which being assented to, Mr. H. said further legislation on the bill was unnecessary, as the claim had been allowed and paid by the Third Auditor. He would, therefore, move its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

The bill to provide for the issuing patents for certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin Territory, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to authorize an examination and test of Samuel Raub's self-acting double safety valve, was read a second time, when

Mr. DAVIS said that the Senate had already passed and sent to the other House a bill for a general examination into this matter, which, he contended, would embrace this as well as any other case worthy of observation.

Mr. TIPTON called for the reading of the report which accompanied the bill, which having been read by the Secretary, Mr. T. said would explain all that was necessary in relation to the subject. The great destruction of life and property had, in his opinion, made it the duty of Government to do something to prevent a recurrence of such sad disasters. The committee were of opinion that Congress could do nothing better than to patronize an invention which scientific and practical men had recommended. In reporting the present bill, Mr. T. said, the committee had done what was considered a duty, and that duty being discharged, he was satisfied for the subject to take any course which the Senate might see fit. By the provisions of the bill, the invention would have to be tested, and its utility ascertained, by an authorized experiment, under the sanction of Government.

Mr. DAVIS said he did not rise with a view to disparage the invention; but he would submit to gentlemen if this machine were really what it purported to be, and what was claimed for it in the language of the report just read, whether there would be any necessity to pass the bill? But if he understood the business, it was matter of doubt even to the inventor who had asked an appropriation to test the principle, and whether it could be advantageously applied or not. Mr. D. said there had been another plan before the Senate, from an individual, to accomplish the same purpose, but by different means, that was considered so important that the whole subject matter was referred to a select committee; which, after being carefully investigated, was considered of so equivocal and doubtful a character, that the committee did not feel warranted in making an appropriation, though the scheme was also recommended by scientific and learned men. If there was any degree of certainty in the matter, practical men would soon perceive its utility, and it would become almost immediately adopted, and brought into general use.

Mr. D. said so desirable had it been thought to do something to prevent, if possible, all similar calamities to those which had lately been witnessed from such causes, that a bill had passed that body, in which provision had been made, authorizing the President to appoint a board of examiners, to consist of two scientific gentlemen, and one practical mechanic, versed in building, or constructing steam boilers, whose duty it was made to receive all such inventions as might be submitted to them, and report on their utility or practicability. That bill then would embrace this case as well as others. The Committee on Roads and Canals, he had no doubt, acted from the best impulses in producing the bill; but he was still of opinion, that the wiser course would be, to let this invention be submitted with the others. If the appropriations were not large enough to test it fairly, they might be increased; and with this view of the subject, he had moved to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was accordingly laid on the table.

The bills for the relief of Nathan Peter, and William Adams, deceased, and for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch and cargo, were severally read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Independent Treasury bill was then taken up, when Mr. BROWN rose and addressed the Senate until four o'clock; when

The Senate then went into Executive business, and soon after adjourned over until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 24, 1838

Mr. LAWLER, on leave, laid on the table certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama:

Reports from standing committees were then called for.

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. WORTHINGTON reported the following resolution; which was concurred in:

Resolved, That the clerk of the House of Representatives cause 2000 copies of the survey and chart of the harbor of Havre deGrace and mouth of Susquehanna river, and head waters of the Chesapeake Bay, communicated to the House on the 2d of February, 1837, from the War Department, to be lithographed on a reduced scale, for the use of the House.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LINCOLN reported a bill to authorize the sale of certain public lands of the United States near the Wabash and Erie canal, in the State of Ohio.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia reported a bill for the relief of Captain Robert Lownds.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. MALLORY reported a bill for the relief of Charles Risley.

GRANT OF SCHOOL LANDS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted some time since by Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, for the appointment of a select committee of one from each State to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill granting to each State a certain quantity of public lands, for purposes of education.

Mr. J. modified his proposition, and addressed the House till the expiration of the morning hour, when his remarks were cut off.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report in relation to St. Helena bar, with a view to building a light-house or light-houses; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of lands ceded by the Shawnee Indians; which, on motion of the same gentleman, was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the regular orders were set aside.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Neutrality Bill, the question under consideration being on the following substitute of Mr. HOWARD:

"That the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and inspectors of the customs, the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other officer who may be specially empowered for the purpose by the President of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, respectively, authorized and required to seize and detain any vessel or other means or materials which may be provided or prepared for any military expedition or enterprise contrary to the sixth section of the act passed on the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," and retain possession of the same until the decision of the President be had thereon, or until the same shall be released, as herein after directed.

"SEC. 2 And be it further enacted, That when any person may conceive himself to be aggrieved by the acts of any person authorized by this act to make seizure as aforesaid, he may file his petition before the district court of the district wherein the seizure was made, (which court is hereby authorized and empowered to hear and decide upon the case) stating the facts; and thereupon, after due notice given to the district attorney, and to the person making said seizure, the said court shall summarily hear and adjudge thereupon, as law and justice may require; and if said court shall decide that the said property so seized had been provided or prepared contrary to the provisions of the sixth section of said act, then the same shall be detained by the officer so seizing said property until the President shall order it to be restored to the owner or claimant; but if the decision of said court shall be in favor of the owner or claimant, said property shall immediately be restored."

The question immediately pending was on the following amendment, as an additional section, submitted by Mr. DUNN of Indiana:

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the officer making such seizure, with due diligence, to make application to some judge of the circuit or district court of the United States for a warrant to justify the detention of the property so seized; which warrant shall be granted only on proof, on oath or affirmation, to the satisfaction of such judge, showing good cause to suspect that the property so seized is intended to be used for the unlawful purpose aforesaid. And if said judge shall refuse to issue such warrant, or application therefor shall not be made by the officer making such seizure, within a reasonable time thereafter, the said property shall be forthwith restored to the owner thereof."

In offering this amendment,

Mr. DUNN said that the object of the bill was to authorize a seizure of the property specified, without first making affidavits and obtaining a warrant; and the propriety of such seizure is maintained on the ground that the delay consequent in the procuring of the warrant, would enable the parties implicated to remove the property beyond reach. Without expressing any opinion whether the emergency of the case would justify the departure proposed from the usual course of proceeding, he must say that if it did so justify the seizure it afforded no justification for a detention of the property afterwards, without the usual formalities of the law being complied with.

As the bill came from the Senate, the owner could only obtain possession of his property by giving bond and security, or by obtaining the consent of the President of the United States for its return. The amendment offered this morning by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HOWARD,) had given him another remedy; and that was the right to a summary hearing, on a demand of restoration before a judge. But the burthen of this proceeding fell upon the injured party. He was compelled to seek the judge, whose attendance he had no power to command. He had to give notice to the United States officers. In many instances, this might be highly inconvenient, and great delay arise, especially when the property of persons living at a distance should be taken. He was, therefore, disposed to go a little further; and if it was thought necessary for the public good to relax the strictness of the law as at present established, in the first instance, to permit the seizure, he would require that the usual requisitions and forms of law should be complied with as soon thereafter as possible. The necessity that is supposed to justify a seizure without warrant, does not apply to the detention without warrant; and he would impose this burthen of procuring the sanction of the law for the detention of the property, upon the persons making the seizure; making it his duty forthwith to make out such a case before a judge as would have authorized the issue of the warrant in the first instance, and the detention of the property under it; and if he failed to do so, that the property should be immediately restored. This would not deprive the owner of any remedy he now had, or which it was proposed to give him, but would be an additional safeguard over the rights and property of the citizen. He therefore proposed the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HOWARD.)

Mr. HOWARD said he had understood the gentleman from Tennessee, on yesterday, as moving his amendment as a substitute for the two first sections of the bill, and leave the remainder of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. BELL replied, that his motion was to substitute his amendment for the whole bill; but if it would meet the views of a majority of the House, he might hereafter modify his amendment to meet the suggestions of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CROCKETT said he did not rise with a view to enter at large into the discussion of this measure, but simply to call the attention of the House to the great mass of business before it, and to entreat and implore the House to bring the discussion of this subject to a close, and come to some decision upon it one way or another. Sir, (said Mr. C.) almost three months of the session have already passed away, and what have we done? Almost half the session has passed away, and we have done nothing. We have not as yet, sir, acted upon a single measure of public importance. We have already spent a week or ten days in the discussion of this measure, and, judging from appearances, it seems that there is but little hope of reaching any conclusion in any short time. Sir, I protest against the course pursued by gentlemen in this discussion, and must express my unqualified dissent from the course taken by some of my friends in the course of the debate. It seems to me, sir, that gentlemen have involved themselves in rather an awkward predicament and in almost ridiculous inconsistencies.

The revolution in Texas had been repeatedly referred to, and the late Administration had been denounced in the most unmeasured terms for having failed to enforce the laws, and our obligations of neutrality, with Mexico; and when the present Executive asks for power to do that which they denounced General Jackson for having failed to do, the measure is denounced as arbitrary and tyrannical, and as odious as the alien and sedition law.

Sir, the citizens of the West have been denounced as violators of the laws. Sir, I repel the charge. I have a personal knowledge of the conduct of some of our citizens in relation to the revolution in Texas. I believe, sir, as many of the citizens of the district which I have the honor to represent went to the assistance of the Texans in their struggle for independence, as from any other section of the Union of the same extent; and, so far as my knowledge extends, they had violated no law, but had gone there in the exercise of their unquestionable rights with a view of becoming citizens of the country. No military expedition had been fitted out against Mexico—no organized military force had gone out from this country to the assistance of Texas. But, sir, those who did go, went as private citizens, in the exercise of their lawful rights. And, sir, continued Mr. C. however much I may be disposed to censure some other measures of the late Administration, I am bound to say that, in relation to this case, the then President did all in his power to enforce obedience to the laws of the land and our obligations of neutrality. Did he not issue his orders to all the proper officers on the southwestern frontier to take prompt measures to enforce the laws? But a great outcry has been made because he did not issue a proclamation. I would like to know, said Mr. C. what good a proclamation would have done? It would have been as idle as to "pitch straws against the wind." A mere idle, unmeaning ceremony. Sir, I not only believe the Administration did its duty, but I believe the people who went to the assistance of Texas also did their duty by exercising their rights if they felt disposed to do so. I hope our citizens will never look with indifference upon a people struggling for civil liberty; they would merit disgrace if they did, and would not deserve the name of freemen. But, sir, it is far from my wish that our citizens should violate the laws and our duties towards foreign powers; and I view the existing laws as amply sufficient to secure these obligations, if faithfully observed and enforced. I am, therefore, Mr. Speaker, opposed to the present bill, from beginning to end, amendments and all.

In conclusion, I will repeat my desire that the House will, in the course of this day at least, come to some decision upon this measure, and allow us, at the commencement of the next week, to take up the business of the session, and attend to the duties we owe to our constituents. The country had a right, and I believed it to be their duty, to hold us to an account for this idle and prodigal waste of the public time. Mr. C. repeated that there were many important measures requiring their consideration, and some local measures in which his own constituents felt the deepest interest—measures which had been for nine or ten years before that House, but had been pressed down and kept back by measures deemed to be of more general importance. He trusted, however, that the House would lay aside these idle discussions, and enter at once upon their duties.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Connecticut, most cordially concurred with the gentleman from Tennesse, in the hope that this House would act speedily upon this bill, so that the other important business which was pressing upon the House might be taken up and acted upon. He felt the burthen which was resting upon the House, and he had, on yesterday, opposed the suspension of the rule to take up this bill, because he believed that the facility with which we obtained a suspension of our rules added much to the length of the discussions which we had in the House. He knew the great importance of much of the business which was set aside by this bill, and he trusted that this bill would be disposed of to-day, so that we might go on with the other business which it was our duty to act upon.

With regard to the bill under consideration there were two questions involved in it. The first was, is the power proposed to be conferred constitutional? The second was, is it expedient? With regard to the first question, the constitutional power. What are the features of the Senate bill which has been designated unconstitutional? It is the power to seize and detain property, as it has no relation whatever to personal liberty. He held that no man could be deprived of his liberty or property except by due process of law; and he did not see why it was that the law of arrests had been so frequently quoted on this question, as this matter had no relation to it.

He laid down the principle that no property could be seized but by due process of law, and this was the ground taken by many gentlemen who had opposed this bill. But the seizures which were to be made under the provisions of this bill, arose out of the peculiar circumstances of the case, and, in his opinion, were perfectly justifiable, and in pursuance of the principles of law. There had been a great deal said by gentlemen about these seizures being made without a warrant, but he would beg leave to say to gentlemen, that if we passed this law the law itself would be the warrant for the seizure, and when the the officer of the Government made the seizure, then it is done by the authority vested in him by the law; and therefore seizures made under this law, in case it passed, would be as much by authority of law as though they were made under a warrant, issued by a magistrate. He, therefore, come to the conclusion that this power, great as it was, was still constitutional, and that the fourth article of the Constitution had no bearing upon this case.

Then he next question which arose, was it expedient to pass this law, supposing that we have the power? Certainly we should exercise great power, when great emergencies required it. It was exercising a great power to hang a man—to put a man to death; still the preservation of the peace of society demanded this power to be exercised on some occasions. He believed that this power should be conferred on the President. He was as much in favor of civil liberty as any gentleman, but going on the principle that we are the advocates of civil liberty, how can we better sustain it, than by repressing our citizens from interfering in the affairs of other Governments. Will we not by this involve our own Government in difficulties, and have a blow struck at civil liberty within our own borders.

If we wish to adhere to the principles of justice, is it not proper that we should act justly towards other Governments: and prevent our people from interfering in their affairs? Shall we say to the world that we are so delicately situated that we dare not exercise a power which we would call upon other Governments to exercise, if we were differently situated. This law did not propose any arrest of persons. It was an arrest of property merely which it contemplated, and he thought we were doing a great injury to this bill by discussing it too much. The principle contained in it is recognised in the acts of 1794 and 1818, and our Government has always acted under this principle.

If this bill was passed, and the President directed seizures to be made, it would not be the Executive which conferred the power to make these seizures, but it would be conferred by the law of Congress. He hoped the amendments pending to this bill would fail, so that the House might have the opportunity of voting upon it as it came from the Senate, and then it would either adopt or reject it.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia heartily concurred with the two gentlemen who had preceded him, that this bill had occupied too much of the time of the House. He contended that we had a perfect right, under the Constitution, to pass a bill of this kind, and that the necessity of the case demanded it at our hands.

The law of 1818, he contended, was insufficient, and therefore it was the duty of the House to pass a law conferring sufficient power to preserve our neutrality. The law of 1818 was a penal law; but this law was a preventive law, and he contended that the preventive power was the most efficacious that could be exercised. Was he, then, to be told that you had no preventive power? If so, and you had no preventive power, it was high time you had such a power. But he contended that you had this power, and that it was an appendant power growing out of the national laws of every Government.

It had been contended by some gentlemen that your citizens might go on, and enlist and carry on a war in Canada, without violating our neutral relations. It would be, however, in his opinion an anomaly in the history of nations, that your citizens could be at war, while your Government was neutral. He did not believe in this doctrine, that your citizens could fit out expeditions against other Governments on the plea that they were going to expatriate themselves. Would it do for a company of men to form themselves into a corps, and march into an adjoining territory with all the munitions of war about them, and say that they were exempt from your laws, because they were going to expatriate themselves.

This doctrine he did not believe would hold good any where. If we expected other Governments at any future time to preserve a neutrality with us, we must now enforce the laws upon our own citizens, and compel them to preserve our neutrality. Mr. G. proceeded at some length to reply to the remarks of his colleague, (Mr. WISE,) and others who had spoken against the bill, and concluded by expressing the hope that the House would speedily adopt some bill having in view the preservation of our neutral relations.

Mr. RENCHER addressed the House briefly, contending that the law of 1818 was sufficient to provide a remedy for all cases which might occur on our northern or north western frontier.

Mr. HALSTEAD gave his opinion, that the law of 1818 was defective, but not so much so as to require a very forcible measure now to be enacted; a slight amendment to that act was all that was necessary.

Mr. TOUCEY entered into a brief review of the original bill as it came from the Senate and the pending amendments, and expressed a hope that the sense of the House would be taken without any further discussion.

Mr. PETRIKEN then rose and said, Mr. Speaker, I have waited patiently for five or six days, hoping each day that the speech-makers would get as tired making speeches as we who do not make speeches are of hearing them, but seeing no probability of having my hopes realized, I shall, with a view to put a stop to this debate, if possible, move the previous question.

The CHAIR explained, that the main question, if ordered, would be on the Senate's bill as amended, by limiting its operation to 1840.

Upon taking the count by tellers, the division was—ayes 64, noes 43, no quorum

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a call of the House: lost.

The question being again taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 83, noes 51, and the main question was ordered without a count.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 76, nays 88.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. PATTON moved to reconsider the vote by which this bill had been rejected. He remarked that almost every man who had participated in the discussion, and had avowed his wish to pass some measure to restrain our citizens from committing acts of aggression upon a friendly power, had been found opposing the original bill by the vote just taken, and voting with those opposed to any measure at all.

Mr. TILLINGHAST expressed a hope that the motion would prevail, so that the House might adopt some of the other propositions.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky suggested to Mr. PATTON, as the House was very thin, to withdraw his motion, and give notice of it, which would bring it up on Monday; but Mr. P. declined.

The motion prevailed without a division; and the vote being reconsidered, the bill was again before the House, with all the amendments cut off.

Mr. HOWARD then submitted a substitute similar to that of Mr. BELL'S.

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved to refer the bill, and the various propositions to amend, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to refer them to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BOON made a few remarks on the extraordinary delay this bill had produced, and expressed his intention of voting against it in any and every shape in which it could be presented, amendments and all.

The first motion was briefly advocated by Mr. BIDDLE, when it was disagreed to—ayes 54, noes not counted, and the second motion prevailing—ayes 85.

So the bill was again recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice that on Monday next, he should from necessity be compelled, after petitions had been presented, to ask the House to go on with the appropriation bills, in consequence of the pressing condition of the public service, particularly the army.

The CHAIR laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the contracts made by the Treasury Department during the year 1837, in the construction of light-houses and similar works; which was laid on the table,

On motion, The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 26, 1838.

DEATH OF THE HON. JONATHAN CILLEY.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. FAIRFIELD rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: An event has occurred since our last adjournment, which has spread a deep gloom over this community, and deprived this body of one of its most valuable members. I allude, sir, to the death of my late colleague, the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, which, it is my painful duty to announce, took place on Saturday last near this city. One hour we saw him in full life, standing in the midst of us in all the pride and vigor of manhood; the next, a helpless, inanimate corpse. It is a case, sir, most melancholy and heart-rending in all its circumstances, (of which, however, this is not the occasion to speak,) and brings home to our minds, with peculiar emphasis, the trite but solemn truth, that "in the midst of life we are in death."

My deceased colleague was a man of uncommon talents. His mind was strong, vigorous, well stored, and well disciplined. He had, moreover, that indomitable spirit of perseverance in all the pursuits of an elevated and honorable ambition, which would not rest satisfied with low attainments. He partook largely, too, of that fearless patriotism of his ancestors, which made them "pour out their blood like water," in the war of the Revolution, and which also displayed itself in the brave and chivalrous conduct of an only brother during the late war.

His fellow-citizens had often elected him to places of honor and trust in the State of his adoption, and had now given him a seat among the Representatives of the nation;—among us, who are now spared to deplore his abrupt and tragical removal. Though he had not long been a member of this body, he had established an enviable and an enduring reputation. His ready powers of debate, his warm and fervid eloquence, his manly bearing towards opponents, and courteous demeanor to all, will be readily acknowledged, and long remembered, by the members of this House.

That his sudden and melancholy death will produce a deep sensation in Maine, and indeed throughout the whole country, no one can doubt: but the announciation of the dreadful fact to the partner of his bosom, sitting in the midst of the young pledges of their mutual affection, little dreaming of the blow that awaits her, it is shocking to contemplate. No one can think of it but with feelings of the most poignant and heartfelt grief. May "He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," and who "will not break the bruised reed," give her that consolation and support which she needs, and which no earthly power can give.

With this brief and imperfect announcement, I beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of JONATHAN CILLEY, deceased, late a member of the House from the State of Maine, at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of JONATHAN CILLEY, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of JONATHAN CILLEY, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. FAIRFIELD,

The House then adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 26, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d instant, directing him to communicate the report of E. and G. W. Blunt, of New York, relative to the construction and improvement of light-houses, stating that no such communication had been received at his office, nor at the office of the Fifth Auditor.

Also, a report from the same, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, a list of contracts entered into for the year 1837: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a map of the military road from Saginaw to Mackinaw; which, on motion of Mr. LYON, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TROTTER presented the memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying Congress to ratify and confirm certain preemption claims under the act of June, 1834: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a memorial, signed by seventy-four of the members of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, praying Congress to appropriate a portion of the public funds in a subscription for a part of the capital stock of the Jeffersonville and New Albany Canal Company, incorporated by the State of Indiana, to construct a canal around the falls of Ohio, on the Indiana side, of sufficient capacity to pass steamboats of the largest size.

Mr. S. said he had before had the honor to introduce memorials, numerously signed by the business men of Wheeling and Cincinnati, on this subject. Those memorials had been printed and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. He (Mr. S.) would only say, on the present occasion, that the great importance of the measure was admitted and felt by the whole western country.

On motion of Mr. S. the memorial was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, presented the memorial of the inhabitants of township three, range nine west of Huntsville, Alabama, representing that the 16th section, reserved for schools, in that township is sterile and unproductive, and praying a grant of other lands in lieu of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON presented the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Erie, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to take measures to prevent the re-issue of the notes of the old Bank of the United States: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Philadelphia, asking Congress to establish a dry dock at that place, and setting forth strong reasons why such an establishment should exist there: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be prepared and communicated to the Senate, tables of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and of the price of bank notes at different periods, from such materials as are in the Department, and such others as can be conveniently procured.

On motion of Mr. WALL the Senate took up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the establishment of a port of entry at Jersey City; and, after brief explanations from Messrs. WALL and KING, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, announcing the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, a member of that House from the State of Maine, and stating that the funeral would take place from the hall of the House to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I came into the Senate this morning, exhausted and overwhelmed, to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you and to the Senate of the United States the sudden and lamented death of my friend and colleague, the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, a Representative from Maine in the Congress of the United States.

At the last adjournment of the Senate, Mr. CILLEY was in perfect health, full of hope and expectation of making himself useful in asserting and vindicating the violated rights of his State, and of distinguishing himself in the great questions which now so deeply agitate the public mind; full of zeal and ardent patriotism, and of devotion to the great cause of human liberty and of human rights, he considered that a crisis had arisen when his country had a right to claim the services of her sons. He obeyed the call of his constituents, relinquishing the enjoyments of the domestic circle of a wife and three children. He is now a lifeless corpse; all his hopes are blasted and destroyed, and his constituents are deprived of the services of an able and faithful representative.

Mr. CILLEY was a native of New Hampshire, and belonged to one of the most ancient and respectable families in that State. Patriotism and bravery were his inheritance. His grandfather was the distinguished patriot and brave officer of the Revolution, General CILLEY; and his brother, Captain JOSEPH CILLEY, was the gallant leader of the heroic charge under Colonel MILLER, at the battle of Bridgewater Heights, in the last war.

The deceased was a graduate of Bowdoin College, in Maine, and by his superior talents and application attained a high standing at the bar in that State. He was a good lawyer, an able advocate, and a powerful debater.

From early life Mr. CILLEY was ardently attached to the principles of free government; a zealous advocate of the rights of the whole people, and a determined opponent of the claim of the few to tyrannize over the many.

In 1832, Mr. CILLEY was elected to the House of Representatives in Maine, and in 1835 and 1836 was Speaker of that body, where his talents and love of country became so conspicuous, that in 1837 he was elected to Congress in a district in which the majority were his political opponents.

Of his conduct here I need not speak, for all who hear me, and all who knew Mr. CILLEY in the other end of the Capitol, will bear testimony to his ability, to his open, frank, and determined course, to the high order of his talents and powers as a debater, and to the respect and deference he paid to the rights of others.

As a man, Mr. CILLEY was warm, ardent, generous, noble; as a friend, true, faithful, abiding. He was in the meridian of his life, aged 35: the past was the earnest of the future.

In his death Maine has lost one of her brightest ornaments, and the nation is bereft of a devoted patriot, and an ardent, zealous supporter of its free institutions.

The sun which set upon the lifeless corpse of my late friend and colleague, rose bright and cheering upon his distant fireside circle, and the wife of his bosom blessed its gladsome beams, and told her innocent children that it brought the return of their father one day nearer.

Alas! nor wife nor children shall see him more. Who shall now penetrate that bereaved mansion, and witness the tears, the agony, the distraction of the widow and the fatherless? Mr. President, I cannot. May the Father of all mercies be their comforter and their support.

Of the cause and manner of the death of Mr. CILLEY, I forbear to speak; but allow me to say, that it is my solemn conviction that he entertained no ill will, and intended no disrespect, to Mr. GRAVES, in any thing that occurred; and that in accepting the call, he did nothing more than he believed indispensable, to avoid disgrace to himself, to his family, and to his constituents.

Mr. WILLIAMS then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of the House of Representatives, from the State of Maine, at the hour of twelve o'clock to morrow, and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

And, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased,

Resolved, That the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate then adjourned.

IN SENATE,
TUESDAY, February 27, 1838.

The Senate assembled at 12 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment; and after the journal was read,

Mr. WHITE rose and said, that in order that the Senate might carry into effect the resolution adopted yesterday in relation to attending the funeral of the deceased member from Maine, he would move that the Senate adjourn; which motion being concurred in,

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WEDNESDAY, Feb. 28, 1838.

DEATH OF HON. JONATHAN CILLEY.

As soon as the journal was read—

Mr. FAIRFIELD rose, and asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of seven members be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, late a member of this House, and the circumstances connected therewith, and report thereon to the House.

Resolved, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. BELL rose and objected. Mr. B. said he thought that whatever was done in this matter, had better be postponed until the House became more calm, and was able to act more coolly on the subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. PARKER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 113, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Aycrigg, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bruyn, W. B. Williams—31.

[Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont came to his seat just as the Clerk, in calling the yeas and nays upon the above motion, had passed his name. Mr. F. requested the privilege of recording his name upon the motion pending, as, by the rules of the House, he could not without unanimous consent. Objection being made, the request was denied.]

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. FAIRFIELD rose and said:

Mr. President: entertaining the views and feelings which I do entertain in regard to the awful tragedy in which certain members of this House lately participated, I could not refrain from offering the resolutions which have just been read. Sir, if I had held back, and refused to move in this affair, "the voice of my brother's blood would cry to me from the ground." My late colleague and friend has been shot down and deprived of life in a manner, and under circumstances, that seem to me most imperiously to demand an investigation. It is due to the surviving family and friends of the deceased, that we should take cognizance of this affair: it is due to ourselves, to our country, to humanity, and to God; and I trust that no member will shrink from the high and solemn responsibility thus cast upon him. But, aside from the peculiar circumstances of this case, and our peculiar duties resulting from them, it appears to me that an opportunity is presented, which every good man should be quick to improve, for assailing the barbarous and inhuman practice of duelling—a practice which does violence to the laws of God, to the best feelings of our own nature, and to the dictates of reason—a practice which is entirely behind, and unworthy of the age of civilization in which we live, and which should unite the earnest and faithful efforts of every friend to his species for its extermination.

Under the circumstances of this case, however, the deceased being my friend, and my own feelings being deeply and strongly excited, I feel that there would be a propriety in the Speaker's departing from the usual rule, by omitting to place me upon the committee; and I accordingly make that request.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he had voted against the suspension of the rule to introduce these resolutions, because, on hearing them read, he came to the conclusion that no good could result from them. No one could feel greater grief than himself at the calamity which befel the friends of the gentleman whose death we all now mourned, but he had voted against bringing in these resolutions because he did not know what power Congress had to suppress duelling. It was an evil in the state of society which made it necessary in some cases for gentlemen to resort to this mode of settling personal disputes, and he much regretted that it was so; but he did not apprehend that this inquiry was going to correct the evil, or that any salutary good could be effected by this inquiry. As to the particulars in this case, if it was desired to obtain them, the morning papers gave all the facts and circumstances connected with it; and if it was intended to enact an anti-duelling law, he would ask where, under the Constitution, you obtained the right to enact it. That was a matter which which belonged to the States alone, and many of them have passed laws on this subject; and, in his opinion, it would be a usurpation of power for Congress to undertake to act on this subject. He should vote against this resolution because he considered that it would be a reflection upon all the parties connected with the unfortunate occurrence alluded to in the resolution. He looked upon it as reflecting upon the wisdom and the justice of the parties engaged in it. He would ask any gentleman if either of these parties had been guilty of any moral delinquency, or of any act which would bring him so far within the rules and laws of the House as to justify his expulsion? If any gentleman would rise in his place, and state that either of them had violated the rules of honor, or done any act which would make him an unfit associate for the members of this House, he would go as far as any one to have this inquiry instituted; he would vote, not only for a committee of inquiry, but he would vote to expel such individual from the House; and he would almost go to expel him from off the face of the earth. But no such thing had been intimated against any member of the House, and what right have we to go into this matter? What right have we to inquire into the private relations of gentlemen? What right have we to institute ourselves into a board of honor to inquire into a matter of this kind. He would tell gentlemen that it would be an unpleasant duty to serve on a committee of this kind, and that it would require more than ordinary nerve to serve on it. He would tell them that if this committee was raised it would be the occasion of much strife and difficulty. He should not like to serve on such a committee unless he should prepare himself at once for such encounters. He considered it entirely improper that the House should agitate this question at the present time.

Mr. PARKER said he regretted that he found himself compelled to differ in opinion from his friend from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON;) that he had heard from him no good reason expressed against the adoption of the resolutions. It was said that Congress had no power to legislate on this subject, and that that power was reserved to the States. Surely Congress has the power to act in reference to the District of Columbia, and it could not be denied that the House of Representatives had jurisdiction over its own members. His friend had said that if any member would state on this floor that the unfortunate transaction had not been conducted according to the rules of the "code of honor," he would vote for this resolution. Mr. P. said he made no assertion of that kind. He did not profess to be skilled in the nice technicalty of those rules, as they were understood by some gentlemen here; that with his constituents the rules of honor were the rules of law, religion, and morality; but he would say that the transaction referred to was a violation of the laws of God and man, and called imperiously upon this House to guard against the recurrence of such heart-rending scenes; and every consideration of duty to the public and to ourselves required prompt and decisive action. His friend had said that the reference of this subject to a committee would probably lead to further collision, and a repetition of personal conflict. Mr. P. said he could not believe it. He had yet to learn that a member of this House could not on this floor, or in committee, fearlessly express his opinions, and discharge his duty, without fear of a personal attack. He had no tears on that subject for himself.

Here Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland interposed, and mutual explanations took place.

Mr. P. then proceeded. He admitted that, if the committee were to be confined to the question whether "the code of honor" had been departed from, personal controversy might grow out of it. Gentlemen might well differ in discussing unwritten rules of such cobweb fineness, and about which, sir, honorable gentlemen might well differ in opinion. Sir, that committee would look beyond such limits: they would have in view the honor and character of the nation and of this House, and the general welfare of the people.

It was said public opinion sanctioned the practice of duelling. He thought otherwise; and he was sure it would not be countenanced in those sections of the country with which he was familiar. But if public sentiment tolerated such a practice in any part of the country, it was the more important to adopt such measures on this occasion as would serve to correct it. He certainly was not disposed to act too hastily. It was proper to refer the matter to a committee. They would act deliberately, and he hoped would recommend some measures that would remedy the evil. He should therefore vote for the resolutions.

Mr. DAWSON said that no gentleman regretted more than himself, the unfortunate occurrence which had taken place, but he considered that when we were about to involve the feelings of all the gentlemen connected with the affair, that we ought to pause before we acted. He would inquire of gentlemen what the result of this inquiry would be, and what benefit could accrue to the community from it. He admitted that Congress had a right to pass a law to prohibit duelling in the District of Columbia, and for such a measure, when brought forward, he would vote; but he would ask gentlemen what good was expected to result from this inquiry. This matter had no relation to the business of the public, so that if it was gone into, it must be looked upon as an inquiry into the private doings of the members of the House out of these walls, and apart from their Legislative character. In his opinion, this inquiry would only add to the excitement, and bring the state of the public mind to such lengths, as might be regretted by all of us.

If gentlemen desired by this inquiry to get arguments in favor of a law to prohibit duelling, he thought there was no necessity for it, because, in his opinion, no argument was needed to support such a measure. In the name of morality and of religion, he would say, let such a law be passed; but he would regret to see an inquiry of this kind instituted. Pass such a law, and do all that can be done in future to prevent it, but do not institute an inquiry into the present case for the purpose of gratifying the public mind, or for any other purpose. He referred to the difficulty of making an inquiry into a matter which had been conducted solely upon the principles of honor, which were only recognised by a portion of our people, and trusted that the House would be satisfied by adopting a remedy for the future, without going into an examination of the past. To vote for such a proposition as that would be as far as he could go, and he hoped the House would go no farther.

Mr. MATTHIAS MORRIS of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the resolution, by adding at the end of it a clause making it the duty of the committee to make the inquiry with a view to bring in a law against duelling.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON moved to amend the amendment by adding to it a clause, directing the committee to make an inquiry with regard to the strong expressions used by gentlemen in debate in the House.

Mr. MATTHIAS MORRIS said he had no disposition to take part in the discussion of this question, but on hearing the resolution read it had occurred to him that it did not reach far enough, and he had proposed his amendment with a view of having some action of Congress on this subject, which would prevent the practice of duelling in future. This was the only object he had in view, and he hoped his amendment would meet with no objection from any quarter.

Mr. BELL had hoped that no resolution of this kind would have been introduced until after the lapse of a few days, so that the House might have acted upon it free from that excitement and feeling which now existed with respect to this unfortunate transaction. He did not doubt that the introduction of this resolution was well intended; and he had no doubt that the motive of the House, in suspending the rules for the purpose, was a very laduable one; but it was his deliberate judgment that this resolution was not calculated to produce that desirable result which was expected to arise from it. Instead of its being a benefit, he feared that it would be the cause of additional mischief. He presumed it was the intention of a majority of the House to take some action on this subject, with a view of preventing a repetition of such occurrences in future; but he would inquire whether it would not be better for gentlemen to act on the subject at a time when they could do so more calmly then at present. He did not believe, with the gentleman from Maryland, that there was any danger of violence or collision, if this resolution was adopted; but he did expect that there would be strong personal feeling and prejudice and passion and honest excitement exhibited. He regretted the occurrence as much as any person, but he thought it would be highly improper for the House now to act upon it. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the whole subject until this day week.

Mr. ELLMORE said if the gentleman from Maine intended his resolution as the foundation for a law against duelling, he must vote against it; but if it was intended to inquire whether there had been a breach of the privileges of the House committed with respect to this transaction, he considered it to be the duty of every member of the body to meet and stand up to it, and that no feeling or sympathy should induce any one to shrink from it. If this was the object of the gentleman's resolution, or if he would so shape it, he would vote for it; but if it was not, he must vote against it.

Mr. BELL hoped the Chair would confine the discussion to the motion to postpone.

Mr. FAIRFIELD thought the resolution was broad enough to meet the views of the gentleman from South Carolina, and hoped he would give it his support.

Mr. ELLMORE did not consider the explanation of the gentleman from Maine as sufficiently satisfactory to induce him to vote for it.

Mr. TURNEY inquired what effect the previous question would have on this question.

The CHAIR stated that it would bring the House to a direct vote upon the resolution.

Mr. TURNEY then said that, entertaining the opinion that a discussion of this subject at this time was highly improper, and calculated to create that very state of things which had been spoken of by his colleague, (Mr. BELL,) and believing that no member of the House can act understandingly, or discuss the question properly in the dark, he felt it to be his duty to move the previous question.

The question was then taken on the second, and the House refused to second the previous question: ayes 84, nays 86.

Mr. McKENNAN said that the peculiar position in which he stood towards his constituents, demanded that he should say a word in explanation of the vote he had given against the suspension of the rule, and state the reasons why he would vote in favor of the motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject for one week. His constituents, he said, condemned the practice of duelling in the most unqualified terms; and in that condemnation he most heartily agreed with them. He abhorred the practice, from the very bottom of his soul, and would go as far as the farthest on this floor in suppressing it. He further said, he would yield to no gentleman in deploring the tragical event which had cast a melancholy gloom over the city, and which we had all been called upon to mourn. He sympathized, deeply sympathized, with the relatives of the deceased; and if he could pour the oil of consolation into the bosom of his surviving partner, nothing would afford him more satisfaction.

[Here the SPEAKER interposed, and said the question was on postponement.]

Mr. McK. said he did not wish to transgress the rule; that he would heartily go for the amendment offered by his colleague, (Mr. MORRIS,) which looked to legislation, and proposed to do something to put an end to a practice which is fraught with such lamentable consequences, and in the condemnation of which, in principle, all seem willing to unite; that the resolution of the gentleman from Maine proposed no legislation, no suppression by law of the evil, but an examination merely into the facts of the late dreadful catastrophe. They were already before the public; and it could lead to no beneficial result to hasten the investigation. If, after paying the usual honors to the memory of the deceased, it was intended to cast an imputation upon the conduct and character of the survivor, the passions of the members ought to have time to cool; the excitement, which all feel, should be allayed, and we should approach the subject with that coolness and deliberation which are so necessary to enable the House to come to a just and impartial conclusion. Justice to the characters of all concerned, demanded that the investigation should be full and fair, without prejudice, and without passion. He, therefore, hoped that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to postpone for a few days would prevail.

Mr. BOON said that he had voted for a suspension of the rules for the purpose of bringing this subject before the House; but he did not do so with a view of resolving the House into a court to investigate the code of honor, or because he did not profess to know any thing of that code as some gentlemen understood it.

The CHAIR here interposed, and said the gentleman was varying from the question pending.

Mr. BOON resumed. He had voted for the suspension, and should now vote for the resolution upon the ground of its being a matter of privilege, involving the right of debate in this House. Upon this ground, and this ground alone, would he vote for it.

Mr. POTTER could not see any good result which could arise from the postponement of the question to a future day. No honorable gentleman would suffer any other feelings to influence his course than those which pertain to high and pure principles of a moral character and duty to his country. If he could concur in opinion with his honorable colleague, that this proceeding cast any reflection upon the living, or the memory of the dead, he would pause, and ask for more time to consider and reflect upon the subject. In no instance should this House act precipitately or without due consideration. It more especially behooves them then to deliberate, when the censure of this House, or a reflection, is cast upon any individual. This never should be done without clear and full evidence of demerit in the individual subject to it, and in a case of which the House has cognizance. But he could not for one moment believe that any reflection was cast, or intended to be cast, on any human being, by the immediate action of the House on the subject desired to be postponed.

The subject was one deeply interesting to the moral feelings of the community, and to the effects it might hereafter produce on the community, in bringing about and sustaining a healthy feeling in public opinion on this and similar questions. He could see no good reason why it should not be speedily disposed of. It has been suggested that we should not move farther on this subject at present on account of the excitement alleged to exist. In this, he differed from the honorable gentleman from Tennessee. It was always with a distrust of his own opinion, when he so differed. But, if excitement existed, the way to allay it in this House, was to dispose of the question in some shape or to a committee, or reject the proposition. Delay in the disposal of it, only tended, in his judgment, to increase excitement. If the question was one of final action, it would be different; but as one of inquiry alone, now was the time for action, and a disposition of the question: now is the accepted time; and he trusted the House would speedily dispose of it.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then, in order to meet the views of gentlemen, modified his resolution, by adding to the end thereof the following: "And further to inquire whether there has been in the case alluded to, any breach of the privileges of this House,"

Mr. LOOMIS said it appeared to him, when they had so plain a state of facts as was here presented, that there could be no difficulty in deciding upon it at once. Where there had been a member of the body taken away of a sudden from amongst us, and his constituents deprived of his services, he looked upon it to be the duty of the House to examine into it.

The CHAIR here interposed, and reminded the gentleman that he was wandering from the question pending.

Mr. LOOMIS said he had no desire to transgress the rules of order, but it appeared to him, under the circumstances of this case, it was the duty of the House to act upon the case at once. The circumstances of the case, he thought, demanded an inquiry, and that inquiry he imagined would not involve the character of any member of the body. There was no judgment of the House asked for. It was only asked that an inquiry should be made, and he hoped that no postponement would take place.

Mr. GRENNELL had heard no good reason for immediate action on this question, and he trusted the question would be postponed until the present excitement had passed away. It would, in his opinion, be highly improper to act upon this resolution at present, and he hoped a postponement would take place until the House could act upon it more calmly and justly.

Mr. BRONSON said, that when the suggestion was first made by the gentleman from Tennessee to postpone the further consideration of this subject for one week, he was disposed to favor the idea, and it seemed to him proper; but on reflection, (said Mr. B.) and after adverting to the particular question, now before the House, he felt compelled to oppose any postponement of the subject. I feel the full force of the remarks which fell from the gentleman from Tennessee, deprecating any rash or sudden action on this subject, under the excitement of feeling prejudice or sympathy; and that we should not act until the excitement of the moment has had time to cool.

Sir, no man can feel more forcibly than I do the propriety of discarding all extraneous feeling, all passion, prejudice, and excitement, and even sympathy; and that, as members of this House, we should bring to the consideration of this subject no other feelings but those of the sternest dictates of duty and loftiest sense of right and justice; and I trust that in such a spirit this House will approach the consideration of the subject whenever it is finally brought before them for final and decisive action. At present, sir, the question is not what we shall do, but whether we shall act at all; whether we shall proceed to investigate the matter; whether we shall take any cognizance of the late most tragical and unfortunate occurrence.

Should the proposed committee be appointed, they will proceed to investigate the facts, but it must necessarily be many days before they can report, and probably a much longer time will elapse before their report comes in, than that to which the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to postpone the consideration of this matter. Then, and not till then, sir, we shall be called upon to take some final action in the matter, to consider the whole case. Then sufficient time will have elapsed, I trust, to allay all excitement and undue feeling.

In the mean time, sir, we are now called upon to say whether we will act at all—whether we will notice this matter, or take cognizance of it in any way.

On this point, then, if we act at all, we should act promptly. Our duty to our country and ourselves requires of us that we should entertain the resolution—that we should at once show our willingness to investigate. On this point there should not be any delay. I feel bound, therefore, to vote against the motion to postpone, and I trust the resolution to raise the committee will be adopted by the House.

Mr. REED was in favor of postponing.

Mr. TOUCEY called for the yeas and nays on postponing, which were ordered, and were—yeas 84, nays 117, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Bouldin, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, William B. Carter, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Dawson, Dromgoole, Dunn, Everett, Ewing, James Garland, Rice Garland, James Graham, William Graham, Grennell, Griffin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Herod, Hoffman, Howard, Robert M. T. Hunter, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Kemble, Lawler, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, May, McKennan, Menifee, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Patton, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robertson, Sawyer, Sergeant, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Southgate, Stanley, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yell, and Yorke—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Bynum, William B Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Clark, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davee, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Goode, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Harrison, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Holsey, Hubley, William H. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, and Worthington—117.

So the House refused to postpone.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana stated that if he had been in the House when the vote to suspend was taken, he should have recorded his name against it, for he was opposed to any investigation of the matter, and he had therefore voted for Mr. BELL's motion to postpone, and he went on to give his reasons against the proposition. The investigation was one that would produce the most distressing results, and could lead to no possible good. It could not be designed to asperse the dead, and such was the high character of the living in his own State that it was impossible for that House to fix a stain upon him. Mr. G. believed also it was intended to give a political turn, out of doors at least, to this transaction, and he reprobated the course of the ministers of the gospel yesterday in their allusion to it in performing the funeral obsequies.

Mr. BOULDIN, in a few remarks, expressed his intention of voting for the resolution, though he had doubts of its expediency, as he had of the original resolution out of which this matter grew, and would prefer that his friend from Maine would withdraw it.

Mr. EVANS said no one could regret more than he did the catastrophe that had taken place, and if the resolution offered was designed to do honor to the deceased's memory, he would vote for it. If it was intended to express the disapprobation of the House upon the practice that led to Mr. C's death, he would vote for it. Was it designed to take cognizance of all concerned in the matter? If so, they must go into it remotely as well as closely, directly and indirectly; and though he was at a loss to see the object, but believing some good was designed, he should vote for it.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said, it has been with feelings of surprise and pain that I have listened to the remarks of my colleague (Mr. EVANS) and the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. GARLAND.) And in regard to the remarks of the latter gentleman, my surprise was mingled with no small degree of indignation. That feeling, however, has now subsided. If that gentleman is incapable of entering into my feelings in moving this inquiry into the causes which led to the death of my friend and colleague, and can find no motive but a political or sinister one, I cannot dignify the feeling I entertain for him by calling it resentment. Sir, I have no wish to use harsh epithets, nor will I commence an attack upon any man; but self-defence is a right which I cannot willingly yield.

The gentleman from Louisiana has also insinuated that I knew of the contemplated duel, and stood by without making any effort to prevent it; and now that it has terminated fatally to my friend, have come into the House to move a committee of investigation. To that gentleman, sir, have no reply to make; but to the House I wish to say, that I did not know that a challenge had been sent to my colleague by the survivor in the contest until near 12 o'clock of the day on which they fought, when I was told that they had already gone out, and no one knew what ground they had selected. Neither of my colleagues, nor myself, were his confidants in this unfortunate affair.

[The SPEAKER here interrupted Mr. F. and stated that the circumstances of the duel could not be gone into under this resolution.]

Well, sir, let that pass then. But my colleague (Mr. EVANS) comes in with his inuendoes. He cannot possibly perceive the object of moving this inquiry. What is it? says the gentleman. What can be effected by it? what good will it do? Sir, is it possible that my colleague can seriously entertain such questions on this subject? One of our number, a Representative from the State of Maine, was shot down and deprived of life by another member; and when a resolution is moved to inquire into the circumstances, and to have the facts reported to the House, that some action may be had thereon, my colleague is at a loss to perceive the object of such a resolution!

He is in great doubt, and says that if any evil comes of it, he washes his hands of it. Sir, when I ask that gentleman to assume and relieve me from a responsibility voluntarily incurred by myself, I shall be so explicit as not to be misunderstood. But of all affairs in which I was ever engaged, this is the last from which I would wish to be relieved. If the country and the House will not sustain this inquiry, and I am to incur consequences from which my colleague is so desirous of washing his hands, I have only to say that a foreknowledge of all would not have changed my course. What I have done has been a matter of duty, and from the performance of that no danger shall deter me. Hence my friend from Virginia (Mr. BOULDIN) will pardon me for declining to accede to his request, and withdraw my resolutions.

Is it asked, what is the object? I answer, to have the facts correctly reported to the House, and then to take such action as the facts warrant. If any members have been guilty to that extent which warrants their expulsion, why let them be expelled: for one, I will not shrink from such a course if it should seem to be the proper one.

But it is said by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. GARLAND,) that this thing cannot be prosecuted without serious consequences; and the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. JOHNSON,) has said that if he were placed on such a committee, he should feel a necessity of going thoroughly armed. Sir, I am no duellist. I have adopted principles that forbid revengeful or vindictive feelings, much more the taking of a fellow-creature's life. But, sir, I will not be deterred from doing what I deem to be my duty, by any threats which may be thrown out from any quarter. And has it come to this, that a member of this House is to be called to account out of it for words spoken in debate, and shot down; and that, when an inquiry into the circumstances is proposed, we are told to take care—that such an inquiry cannot be had without exposing ourselves to personal danger! Sir, if we have really come to this pass, it is high time the country knew it; and it is high time, too, that some steps should be taken to prevent the evil, and to have a just and fearless representation of the people maintained. The course now proposed is taking one step towards that object, and I hope it will be followed up by such measures as will effectually secure the members of this House in freedom of debate and security of person.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts stated that he had voted against the postponement in the hope that a subdued feeling prevailed, but it was obvious to him that they had arrived at a point where they ought to pause; and for the purpose of affording that opportunity, he moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the motion to postpone.

Mr. CLOWNEY demanded the previous question, which the CHAIR stated would be on the original resolution, as modified by the mover.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts then moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. PETRIKEN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 74, nays 125.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

The CHAIR then stated that, upon the re examination of the point, as brought to his notice by Mr. BRIGGS, the main question would be on the motion of Mr. CALHOUN.

The House then seconded the demand for the previous question—ayes 105, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered, was rejected—ayes 75, noes 106.

So the House refused to consider.

Mr. CLOWNEY then demanded the previous question on the resolution as modified; which was seconded—ayes 105, noes not counted.

Mr. SHERROD WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 86.

So the House determined that the main question, being on the adoption of the resolutions, be now put.

Mr. CUSHMAN and Mr. TAYLOR rose simultaneously, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 152, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Clark, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Duncan, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, I. Fletcher, Fillmore, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Goode, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Marvin, Martin, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKim, McKennan, Mercer, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Mathias Morris, Samuel W. Morris, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Patterson, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Phillips, Pickens, Plumer, Potts, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Russell, Sheffer, Augustine H. Shepherd, Charles Shepard, Sheplor, Sibley, Slade, Smith, Spencer, Stewart, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, J. W. Williams, Worthington, Yell, and Yorke—152.

NAYS—Messrs. Aycrigg, Bell, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, Wm. B. Carter, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Connor, Cranston, Curtis, Dawson, Dromgoole, Dunn, Ewing, Rice Garland, James Graham, William Graham, Harlan, Hawes, Hoffman, R. M. T. Hunter, Henry Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Legare, Mallory, James M. Mason, Maury, May, Milligan, Mitchell, Patton, Pearce, Pope, Ridgway, Robertson, Sawyer, Shields, Snyder, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Underwood, Albert S. White, John White, Sherrod Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—49.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The CHAIR laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy, and translation, of Mr Gorostiza's pamphlet; which,

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting all the information in the possession of that Department in relation to the renewal of duty bonds authorized by the act of last session.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of balances against all deposite banks not secured, or will probably be lost, together with the amount of other similar balances.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, laid on the table.

Mr. M. MORRIS of Pennsylvania, then, on leave, the rules being suspended for that purpose, submitted the amendment before offered by him to the original resolution, as an instruction to the select committee; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JENIFER asked leave to submit another proposition providing against personalities in debate; but pending the question,

On motion of Mr. PATTON,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, February 28, 1838.

Mr. NORVELL presented a petition from sundry citizens of Michigan, praying the establishment of a certain mail route in Shiwasse county; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEN presented a petition, emanating from Canton, in Ohio, praying an amendment of the existing laws in relation to the post office, by which newspapers might be exempted from postage in the counties where they were published: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial from Daniel J. Browne, a citizen of the United States, in relation to the preservation of timber, necessary for the navy of the United States. Mr. W. said, as the memorialist was distinguished for his attainments in that particular branch of knowledge, and as the memorial contained much valuable information, he would move that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, presented a circular petition from the friends of a tried and sound currency in New York, praying the establishment of National Bank; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the following Resolutions of the Democratic Delegation of Philadelphia County, Pa.:

At an adjourned meeting of the Democratic county delegation, (elected in August last,) held pursuant to public notice, at Berrill's hotel, February 24th, 1838, the president, Dr. Geo. W. Riter, in the chair, and Dr. P. Binder and C. V. Hagner, secretaries—

The minutes of the last meeting were read and adopted; when it was

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the views of the delegation on the subject of a resolution offered in the House of Representatives of this State, by William F. Johnston, of Armstrong county, and adopted by that body.

The following gentlemen were appointed, viz: Messrs. C. V. Hagner, J. A. Dean, John Miller, Richard Bacon, and B. E. Carpenter; who, after having retired for a short time, reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, viz:

Whereas, the House of Representatives of this State passed a resolution, by 51 to 49, offered in that body by Wm. F. Johnston, of Armstrong county, instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to vote for a postponement of the bill commonly called the "Sub-Treasury bill:"

And whereas, Samuel F. Reed, one of the Representatives from this county, voted for said resolution, notoriously against the views and expectations of this body, who nominated him, and, in the opinion of this delegation, against the wishes of the Democratic party of the county of Philadelphia, who elected him:

And whereas, if he, the said Reed, had faithfully represented those who elected him to the situation he now holds, and had voted on the occasion alluded to in the negative, along with his more faithful colleagues, the aforesaid resolution would not, and could not have passed. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That, under the foregoing circumstances, our Senators and Representatives in Congress, particularly the Hon. James Buchanan, for whom, it is presumed, the blow was intended, be, and are hereby, earnestly requested to pay no regard to said resolution, but consider it null, void, and of no effect.

Resolved, That a copy of these proceedings be forwarded to the Hon. James Buchanan, with a request to lay the same before the Senate; and, also, that a copy be forwarded to Colonel L. Paymer, Representative in Congress from this county.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Democratic papers of Philadelphia. Adjourned.

G. W. RITER, President.

PETER BINDER, CHARLES V. HAGNER, } Secretaries.

Mr. BUCHANAN, in presenting these proceedings, said he regretted that he could not comply with the request of the Democratic delegation of the county of Philadelphia, that he should pay no regard to the instructing resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. On this subject his determination was fixed, and could not be changed by any human power except the Legislature itself; and much as he respected the source from which this request emanated, and it was entitled to all respect, he could only refer the delegates to the remarks which he had made in the Senate, some days ago, on presenting the resolution of instruction, as a fair exposition of his views upon the subject. Had he consulted his own feelings, he would have resigned rather than obeyed; but friends, whose opinions he valued, had convinced him it was a case for obedience, and not for resignation. He was sorry to be placed in this position, because there was no man in the country who, as an individual was more decidedly and strongly in favor of a separation between the banks and the Government than he was himself.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House to subscribe for ten copies of Niles's Register for each of the members of Congress, provided that he would consent to publish the proceedings of Congress, with the yeas and nays on each question so taken, and also a supplement at the end of the session, containing all public and private laws of Congress, and furnish to each member one copy of this supplement free of charge.

The resolution has had its first reading.

Mr. ROBBINS moved that it be read a second time now.

Mr. BENTON said he objected to it. It was time for this business to be stopped, and he should call for the yeas and nays on the question. The argument used, in the first instance, by gentlemen who advocated this system of book purchasing, was, that some members had been furnished with books which the new Senators had not. In this case the argument would not apply, and we had now reached that point where the whole system might be abandoned, and he hoped it would be.

Mr. ROBBINS said he would move to lay it on the table for the present.

Mr. BENTON. There let it lie, and I hope for ever.

Mr. ROBBINS said he would not consent to that.

The question being taken on laying it on the table, it was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. WALL presented a petition from sundry citizens of a county in New Jersey, signed by 80 men and 51 women, praying that Congress will not yield to any representations in relation to the annexation of Texas to this country, let them emanate from what source they may: laid on the table.

Also, a petition from Roswel L. Colt, praying confirmation of a certain tract of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LYON presented the petition of W. N. Terry, of Pontiac, in the State of Michigan, a soldier of the Revolution, now seventy-eight years of age, who is poor and unable to labor, and prays Congress to pay him specie or Treasury drafts for two continental bills, amounting to forty-one dollars, besides interest on the same, which he thinks ought to be paid; one of which bills he received from the hand of Gen. WASHINGTON, for his services as waiter about the time he was discharged, and the other he received shortly after: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WALL presented the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Newark, New Jersey, expressing their opinions in relation to a variety of public measures. Mr. W. said that though he could not concur with them in the views they expressed, (and he would take occasion hereafter of expressing his dissent,) he was desirous of showing the utmost respect to these proceedings, and he moved therefore that they be laid on the table and printed.

The motion motion was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG presented several petitions from the citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of new post routes, and several petitions from sundry citizens of the same State, praying for the passage of a pre-emption law: all of which were referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of Cirot Gantes, praying for confirmation of certain private land claims in Arkansas: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of the heirs of Col. A. Cleaveland, praying for a pension, or to extend the pension act, so as to embrace widows: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of James Bancroft, legal representative of a Revolutionary soldier, praying Congress to provide for the payment of certain outstanding continental bills: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Affairs.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of sundry citizens of Tennessee, asking for the establishment of certain mail routes: referred to the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the special committee of the Senate, appointed on the 21st instant, be, and they hereby are, authorized to employ a clerk to perform such duties as may be assigned to him by said committee.

On motion of Mr. MOUTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a separate judge in the Western District of Louisiana.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama presented a communication from the Governor of the State of Alabama, covering the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of that State, in favor of the annexation or Texas to the Union: read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Nathan, Peter, and William Adams, deceased.

The bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch and cargo.

The bill to provide for issuing patents for certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin Territory, and

The bill to establish a port of entry at Jersey City.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the bill to establish two additional land offices in that part of the Territory of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi, was taken up; and after a short discussion, in which Messrs. WALKER, SEVIER, CLAY of Alabama, LYON and KING took part, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill as the special order, when

Mr. DAVIS rose and addressed the Senate for about two hours in opposition to the bill, and gave way on a motion of Mr. WEBSTER to adjourn.

Mr. PRENTISS asked the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his motion for a moment, in order that he might give notice that he should ask leave to-morrow to introduce a bill to prohibit duelling in the District of Columbia. Mr. P. said he had hoped that some Senator of more influence than himself, had undertaken the subject; but, educated as he was, in principles adverse to duelling, and with which he could make no compromise, he would take the responsibility on himself.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, March 1, 1838.

The following Select Committee on the resolution to inquire into the circumstances which led to the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, was read from the journal this morning:

Mr. TOUCEY of Connecticut.
Mr. POTTER of Pennsylvania.
Mr. BRIGGS of Massachusetts.
Mr. ELMORE of South Carolina.
Mr. BRUYN of New York.
Mr. HARRISON of Missouri.
Mr. RARIDEN of Indiana.

Mr. BRIGGS drew the attention of the CHAIR to the fact that he was already a member of two standing committees; and by a rule of the House, he was entitled, on that ground, to be excused; and he respectfully made that request to the House.

The CHAIR said, that at the time of appointing the gentleman on the select committee, he was not aware the gentleman was a member of two standing committees.

Mr. BRIGGS was accordingly excused, and the vacancy ordered by the House to be filled up.

Mr. GRANT asked leave to present certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, but it was objected to.

Reports from committees were then called for.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOULDIN made a report generally on so much of the President's Message as relates to the affairs of the District, and moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the report, and the same having been read from the Clerk's table,

Mr. BOULDIN moved to lay the report on the table, and print it.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that this subject would be placed in such a position that it could not be brought up at an early day.

After a few explanatory remarks by Messrs. BOULDIN, ADAMS, JENIFER, MERCER, and GRENNELL, the report was, on motion of Mr. JENIFER, recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOULDIN then, on leave, presented a petition from citizens of the District.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. BIRDSALL asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that they severally lie on the table, which was ordered: The petition of Randall Hewit; the petition of Jacob Mitchlor; and the petition of Samuel Hudson.

Mr. B. asked leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of William Doyle; and the petition of Samuel Gray, and that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions: referred accordingly.

Mr. B. asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Samuel Gray; and that it be referred back to the Committee of Claims: referred accordingly.

Mr. B. made adverse reports upon the following petitions: The petition of the heirs of Capt. Daria Arell; the petition of Andrew M. D. Jackson; the petition of the heirs of William Pugh; the petition of George Anderson, executor, &c. of Josiah Anderson, deceased; which reports were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri arose, and stated that on coming to the House this morning, he found that he had been appointed a member of the select committee raised under the resolution of yesterday. He now begged leave to be excused from serving on that committee, for the reason that the State of Missouri had but few members on this floor, and he had a great deal of business to attend to, which he feared he would not be able to do justice to if he were to remain on this committee and attend to the investigation which was expected to take place.

Mr. H. was therefore excused, and the Speaker authorized to appoint another member in his place.

Mr. RENCHER, on leave, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Door-keeper be required to execute strictly the 13th and 14th rules of the House, relative to the privilege of the hall.

Resolved, That no person shall be allowed the privilege of the hall, under the character of stenographers, without a written permission of the Speaker, specifying the part of the hall assigned to him.

Mr. HOPKINS called for a division of the question, and the first resolution was agreed to.

The second resolution being propounded—

Mr. THOMPSON moved thereto the following amendment, "and that no reporter or stenographer be admitted under the rules of the House, unless such reporter or stenographer shall state in writing for what paper or papers he is employed to report, &c." which was agreed to, and so amended, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the orders of the day, but withdrew the motion to enable Mr. HOWARD to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

Mr. HOWARD then reported back the "Neurality bill," which was read twice.

On motion of Mr. BRONSON, the bill was read at length.

Mr. HOWARD moved that it be made the special order for the morning hour of to-morrow. Mr. H. added that he did not think the House ought to postpone the consideration of this bill for a single day or hour longer than was necessary for a full understanding of its provisions. He sincerely hoped, and believed, too, that it had been so framed, from gathering up the suggestions and opinions of members of all sides, that it would be acceptable to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland objected, on the ground that it would set aside his resolution, which had been partly discussed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that it would be better to let the bill remain where it was, and call it up in the morning.

Mr. JOHNSON then moved to make it the special order for to-morrow, from 1 to 2 o'clock; which, after some remarks from Mr. BRONSON on the urgent necessity of passing some measure, was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont, on leave, presented the petition and remonstrance of J. A. Vail, and 187 inhabitants of Montpelier, Washington county, Vermont, protesting against the passage of Mr. BUCHANAN'S neutrality bill, and praying for the recall of all orders for the seizure of arms and ammunitions; also, that Congress would intercede in behalf of the Government prisoners at Montreal, Toronto, and other places; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SLADE also presented a similar petition and remonstrance from other citizens of the same State.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the orders of the day were postponed, and the House took up the Senate bill "to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, in which the late Bank of the United States may be a party."

Mr. THOMAS said that as he saw no other mode of meeting his object, than by moving the previous question on this bill, he, therefore, moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the previous question would not be now sustained, so as to deprive us of the opportunity of saying whether it was constitutional or not to establish a Bank of the United States.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered, and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to postpone the orders of the day until this day week, for the purpose of proceeding with the appropriation bills; which motion was agreed to.

The House then took up the "bill making appropriations for Revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1838."

The question pending was on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, when this bill was last under consideration, his colleague (Mr. CURTIS) had made charges with respect to certain pension agents having the use of the public moneys for six months, as a compensation for their services; and since that time, he had seen a very full report, in a New York paper, of what had been said on that occasion, together with much that had not been said. Now, so far as this charge was concerned, he acquitted his colleague, because the same charge had been made two days before by a Senator in his speech.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that it was not in order to allude to remarks made by a Senator.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then proceeded. In consequence of this charge he had called at the War Department, and had obtained communications from the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of War, which set this whole matter right. The state of the case was, that out of fifty of these agents, forty of them were banks, and the moneys there deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, as well as the disbursing officer, were discounted upon in the same manner in which the banks discounted upon other moneys deposited with them.

Mr. C. then sent the communications to the Chair to be read, together with communications from some of the pension agents, asking of the commissioner to furnish them with more money, as some of the pensioners had not been paid since September last, in consequence of the want of funds.

Mr. CURTIS reiterated the statement he had before made, and said that if he had fallen into error in relation to it, that he was not accountable for the error, as he had come to his conclusions from the reports made from the Departments, and laid upon the tables. He had made application to the War Department in relation to this matter, and had received for answer that it was not usual to answer communications unless made by a resolution of the House, and thus he had been prevented from getting that information which he desired. He had reason to believe, however, that there was always balances in the hands of these pension agents of some million and a half of dollars. Mr. C. then went into an examination of the documents of the House, with a view of showing that he had made his statement on good data.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied to his colleague (Mr. CURTIS) with regard to the course pursued by the War Department. The charge, as he understood it, was that the pension agents had the use of the money placed in their hands This he denied. The money in banks was used as other moneys placed in banks; but it was not used by individual agents. The Department lately, he stated, had pursued a different course with regard to the security to be received for money placed in banks from that which it pursued formerly.

In consequence of this, and in consequence of requiring security for all the money placed in these banks by the Department, the funds in the Commonwealth Bank of Boston were saved. With regard to the statement which the gentleman had referred to, he had only to say that he did not wonder that his colleague had fallen into error with respect to it, because he (Mr. C.) himself had fallen into error on some occasion with respect to these statements. He had, however, obtained another statement from the Department, which showed the exact balances in the hands of these agents, and he laid it before the House; when it was read at the Clerk's table.

Mr. CURTIS made a few remarks in reply, contending that these moneys deposited in banks to the credit of these agents, were subject to be drawn out by them, and applied to their own private uses, the Department having no control over them, and this was the abuse he wished to see corrected.

Mr. BELL contended that it was the duty of the House to examine into this matter, and see that these moneys were properly expended, and ascertain that there was no improper practices connected with the present system of paying pensioners. He did not desire to delay the payment of the old pensioners of the United States, but he desired to correct abuses, if any existed, and he trusted the members of the House would take the responsibility of examining into this matter thoroughly.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. ATHERTON, SIBLEY, MALLORY, CURTIS, REED, CAMBRELENG, PHILLIPS, BELL, JENIFER, McKIM, and MORGAN.

On motion of Mr. LAWLER,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 1, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN said he had received, and would present to the Senate, a memorial numerously signed by citizens of the borough and county of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania, complaining that the medical board appointed under authority of the act of the 3d of March last, by the President of the United States, to select suitable sites for marine hospitals on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and Lake Erie, for the benefit of sick and disabled seamen, boatmen, and other navigators on the western rivers and lakes, have, in discharging that duty, confined their examination exclusively to one or two places on Lake Erie; while the claims of all other places, many of them containing in a high degree all the requisites for such an establishment, have been overlooked and neglected; and praying Congress to order a new examination by a competent, impartial, and unprejudiced board. Mr. McK. said he could not fail to be struck with the similarity between this and the Pittsburg case, which he had the honor to present a few days since. Poor Pennsylvania! the Keystone, in this, as in many other cases, reminded him of the account given of one of old, who fell among thieves, and was shunned and passed by on either side. He could not but feel and express his astonishment and regret that two points so noted and important as Pittsburg and Erie should have been thus wantonly neglected. He moved to refer the memorial to the Committee on Commerce, and hoped that justice would be done: referred accordingly.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying for an increase of compensation for jurors in the courts of the United States, in that State: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the western part of New York, praying that some measures may be taken to ascertain the facts and circumstances connected with an Indian treaty, lately held with certain Indians in their vicinity: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the following memorial:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, delegates of the people of Pennsylvania to a convention now in session at the city of Philadelphia to reform the Constitution of the State, respectfully represent:

That in the present crisis of public affairs, the undersigned deem it their solemn duty, as well as their unquestionable right, to counteract by memorial and remonstrance the false impression which may be made in Congress as to the will of the people of this State concerning their deranged monetary interests, of which will and interests the undersigned believe they enjoy as good means of being well informed as any other representatives of the people of this State.

The people, at every election since the Bank of the United States, first, and afterwards various State banks, have, by violent and improper efforts, been struggling to compel the community to submit to a banking control, contrary to the Constitution, and the well understood public interest and will: the people have at every election chosen representatives instructed to put an end to such bank control, and restore the authority of the people; but too many of those representatives have been misled to sacrifice the will and interests of the people to those of the banks.

Your memorialists have reason to believe that there are very few, whether of the people or their representatives, not unduly influenced by banks, who do not now desire that an entire separation should be realized between Government and all banks, and as speedy a restoration, as may consist with the general welfare, of the hard money which the banks have driven out of circulation; and these two fundamental principles, viz: first, the total separation of Government from all banking operations, and, secondly, the earliest possible restoration of permanent hard money circulation, your memorialists respectfully represent to Congress as the will of the people of Pennsylvania.

The object of this memorial to Congress, therefore, is, that no delay may be suffered to prevent the accomplishment of those ends, but that forthwith, during the present session of Congress, the Senate and House of Representatives may be induced to enact such laws as, under the praiseworthy recommendations of the President, which your memorialists believe are in perfect accordance with the will of the people, may, as soon as possible, afford relief from the present banking inconvenience.

Whereupon the undersigned, by this memorial and remonstrance, respectfully but earnestly request that Congress, especially the Senators and Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, will lose no time in accomplishing this important object.

PHILADELPHIA, February 15, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN, in presenting this memorial, said, that in point of talents, integrity and patriotism, these gentlemen were equal to any other fifty-nine gentlemen who could be selected in Pennsylvania or in any other State of the Union. He had the pleasure of knowing them all, or nearly all, personally, and their opinion on any subject was entitled to the highest consideration and respect from this body. Besides, no gentlemen could have a better opportunity than they had of knowing the feelings and wishes of the people of Pennsylvania, in regard to the Sub-Treasury Bill, or any other question of public importance.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of sundry citizens of Mississippi, praying for the establishment of mail routes: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from citizens of the borough and county of Erie, similar to that which had been presented by his colleague.

He said it was a subject of astonishment to him, that the Medical Board, in their examination of sites for medical hospitals, had not even noticed the claims of Pittsburg and Erie. They had entirely neglected Pennsylvania. Pittsburg was at the head of the navigation of the Ohio. It had justly been called the Birmingham of America; and was a point from which the manufactures of that city and all the immense productions of the country which centred there were scattered over the Southern and Western States, and yet it had been deemed unworthy of examination by this board. Next to New Orleans, he would venture to say, it was the most suitable point on the Western waters for a hospital.

Then, as to Erie, it was the spot where the naval armament had been fitted out which achieved the brilliant victory on Lake Erie. It was, perhaps, the only harbor on the lake where such an armament could be fitted out in time of war. And yet the memorialists state the extraordinary fact that Erie was "entirely overlooked, and the place itself not considered of an importance sufficient even to justify a visit of examination by the medical gentlemen who constituted the board." It seems they must have passed from Buffalo to Cleaveland, without even paying Erie a passing visit. He made these remarks without any personal aim at these gentlemen, for he did not even know who they were. He trusted, however, that Congress would grant the citizens of these two important places in Pennsylvania a fair hearing. That was all he asked.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie on certain conditions, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of relinquishing to the State of Alabama her two per cent. fund, for the purpose of enabling the State to make certain roads, reported a bill for that purpose, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported with amendments the bill to authorize the location of certain pre-emption certificates.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Lacy.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of ceding on reasonable terms to the States in which they are situate, the public lands annually inundated by the Mississippi river, its tributaries and outlets.

Mr. MOUTON presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana, in favor of the pre-emption law, for the benefit of actual settlers on the public lands in that State, excluding floats: read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to establish two additional land offices in that part of the Territory of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi, was read the third time and passed.

The bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was taken up; and,

On motion of Mr. WALKER, it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

The bill for the relief of Major Gen. Alexander Macomb was taken up.

Mr. HUBBARD suggested that the bill had better be passed over, as the Senator from Pennsylvania wished to address the Senate on the subject, and it was now too near the time of taking up the special order.

Mr. BUCHANAN explained that it was not General Macomb's bill that he wished to speak on, but the subject of brevet pay, which he understood was involved in it, on which he wished to say a few words. This subject of brevet pay, he said, would involve not one, but a great many cases. He was ready to say what he had to say whenever the Senator from New Hampshire chose to take up the bill.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill was then postponed, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The following bills were severally read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of Allan A. Moore;
The bill for the relief of Edward Burgess;
The bill for the relief of Abraham Lansing;
The bill for the relief of Sarah Murphy; and
The bill for the relief of John Krepps.

The bill for the relief of Nicholas Hedges, was read the second time and rejected.

SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. DAVIS then rose and resumed his unfinished remarks of yesterday, occupying the floor of the Senate until 3½ o'clock, when,

Mr. STRANGE intimated his intention of addressing the Senate on the subject, but, as it was then late in the day, if would, if no Senator desired to call up the business, move an adjournment.

Mr. WALKER then moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business, which was agreed to, and the doors were accordingly closed, and, after spending a short time in secret session,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 2, 1838.

Mr. GRENNELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. GRANTLAND of Georgia, were announced as being appointed by the CHAIR to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. HARRISON, on the Select Committee to investigate the causes of the death of the late Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY.

In the place of Mr. MUHLENBERG, Mr. CRAIG of Virginia, is now chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and Mr. POTTER was appointed to fill up the vacancy on said committee.

Mr. ADAMS asked the consent of the House to submit a motion to grant the use of the Hall on Tuesday evening next to Mr. Buckingham, to deliver a public introductory lecture on the subject of Egypt.

Objection being made, Mr. A. moved a suspension of the rule; when the vote being 78 to 41, no quorum,

Mr. BOON called for the yeas and nays; which were—yeas 92, nays 60.

So the House refused to suspend the rule.

Reports from committees were then called for.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. McKAY reported a bill to authorize th

President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers.

Mr. McKAY also gave notice that, in consequence of the situation of the country, he should feel it his duty, on some day next week, to ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the bill from the Senate, and now before the House, to provide for an increase of the army of the United States.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HOWARD reported Senate bill, and amendments, in relation to our laws of neutrality, as recommitted to that committee a second time, and moved it be laid on the table, in consequence of the committee having reported a separate bill on the same subject yesterday; which motion was agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reported a bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenues.

Mr. PATTON inquired in what way the Committee of Ways and Means obtained jurisdiction to report this bill?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the finances, and some dozen or more memorials in reference to a National Bank.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was also directed by the committee to make a report on the same subject; but, at the request of the minority of the committee, it was postponed till Tuesday next.

CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported a bill for the relief of Dr. Francis Lambert.

Also, a bill for the relief of John E. Alexande .

COMMERCE.

Mr. DeGRAFF reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Potter and James Cassedy of Wilmington, North Carolina, (read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, on motion of Mr. McKAY.)

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CASEY reported a bill for the relief of certain settlers of the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. YELL reported Senate bill, with amendments, entitled an act for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. LINCOLN presented certain amendments, which were committed with the bill, and all ordered to be printed with Mr. YELL's report.

Mr. CHAPMAN reported a bill for the relief of Daniel H. Hoe.

POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY made several unfavorable reports from this committee.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAWSON reported Senate bill, with amendments, entitled an Act supplementary to the act entitled entitled An act concerning the District of Columbia.

The bill was in relation to the re-organization of the Orphan's Court in the District, and had been reported in consequence of the incapacity of the present judge to fulfil the duties; and, the term being for life, he could not be removed. It provided for a second judge during his life.

The first amendment limited the term, after the demise of the present incumbent, to four years.

Mr. D. moved the concurrence of the House, and pending its consideration, the morning hour expired, and the House passed to the special order, being the reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday, the Senate bill having been laid on the table this morning. This important bill was as follows:

A BILL to amend an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other officer who may be specially empowered for the purpose by the President of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and required to seize and detain any vessel or other means or materials which may be provided or prepared for any military expedition or enterprise, contrary to the sixth section of the act passed on the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," and to retain possession of the same until the decision of the President be had thereon, or until the same shall be released as hereinafter directed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several officers mentioned in the foregoing section shall be, and they are hereby, respectively authorized and required to seize any vessel or vehicle, and all arms or munitions of war, about to pass the frontier of the United States for any place within any foreign state or colony conterminous with the United States, where the character of the vessel or vehicle and the quantity of arms and munitions, or other circumstances, shall furnish probable cause to believe that the said vessel or vehicle, arms, or munitions of war, are intended to be employed by the owner or owners thereof, or any other person or persons, with his or their privity, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or any colony, district, or people conterminous with the United States, and with whom the United States are at peace, and detain the same until the decision of the President be had for the restoration of the same, or until such property shall be discharged by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That nothing in this act contained be so construed as to extend to, or interfere with, any trade with or by the citizens of the United States to or with any parties engaged in war: which trade is now authorized either by treaty or the laws of nations.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the officer making any seizure under this act, to make application, with due diligence, to the district judge of the district court of the United States within which such seizure may be made, for a warrant to justify the detention of the property so seized, which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation, showing that there is probable cause to believe that the property so seized is intended to be used in a manner contrary to the provisions of this act: and if said judge shall refuse to issue such warrant, or application therefor shall not be made by the officer making such seizure within a reasonable time thereafter, the said property shall forthwith be restored to the owner. But if the said judge shall be satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this act, and issue his warrant accordingly, then the same shall be detained by the officer so seizing said property, until the President shall order it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it shall be discharged in due course of law, on the petition of the claimant, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the owner or claimant of any property seized under this act, may file his petition in the circuit or district court of the United States in the district where such seizure was made, setting forth the facts in the case; and thereupon such court shall proceed, with all convenient despatch, after causing due notice to be given to the district attorney and officer making such seizure, to decide upon the said case, and order restoration of the property, unless it shall appear that the seizure was authorized by this act: and the circuit and district courts shall have jurisdiction, and are hereby vested with full power and authority, to try and determine all cases which may arise under this act; and all issues in fact arising under it, shall be decided by a jury in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the officer making any seizure under this act shall have applied for and obtained a warrant for the detention of the property, or the claimant shall have filed a petition for its restoration, and failed to obtain it, and the property so seized shall have been in the custody of the officer for the term of three calendar months from the date of such seizure, it shall and may be lawful for the claimant or owner to file with the officer a bond to the amount of double the value of the property so seized and detained, with at least two sureties, to be approved by the judge of the circuit or district court, with a condition that the property, when restored, shall not be used or employed by the owner or owners thereof, or by any other person or persons with his or their privity, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or any colony, district, or people, conterminous with the United States, with whom the United States are at peace; and thereupon the said officer shall restore such property to the owner or claimant thus giving bond: Provided, That such restoration shall not prevent seizure from being again made, in case there may exist fresh cause to apprehend a new violation of any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person apprehended and committed for trial, for any offence against the act hereby amended, shall, when admitted to bail for his appearance, give such additional security as the judge admitting him to bail may require, not to violate, nor to aid in violating, any of the provisions of the act hereby amended.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall have reason to believe that offences have been, or are likely to be, committed against the provisions of the act hereby amended, within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney of such district to attend at such place within the district, and for such time, as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy and convenient arrest and examination of persons charged with the violation of the act hereby amended; and it shall be the duty of every such judge, or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and to enforce the due execution, of this act, and the act hereby amended.

Mr. HOWARD explained that this bill had been reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in consequence of the difficulty of amending the Senate's bill in such manner as to meet the views of the members of the House. He trusted that this bill would be more acceptable, and hoped that the Clerk would read it by sections, so that the amendments, if any, might be proposed in regular order to the bill.

The first section being read,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out the words which authorized the President to release goods which may be taken in certain cases.

Mr. U. stated the reason why he moved this amendment to be, to prohibit the President from acting in a judicial capacity.

Mr. HOWARD stated that this provision was introduced, because it was considered that the President was the most competent judge in these cases. He was fully acquainted with our relations with foreign countries, which made him more competent to judge in such cases than the judges of courts. If the matter was referred to the courts, there might be difference of opinion between the judges, in consequence of the information which was in their possession; but the President, having all the information, could decide more understandingly and properly. It was a mere power to relieve property that had been seized, and might be assimilated to the pardoning power. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky would not prevail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD replied, that if it was proposed to give this power to the President in consequence of its being merely a pardoning power, there was no necessity for it, as he now had that power under the Constitution and laws without further legislation. His objection to the clause which he had moved to strike out, was, that it invested the Executive with judicial powers, and powers which belonged exclusively to the Judiciary department; because it enabled him to determine whether or not an offence had been committed. He apprehended it would not do in this country to vest judicial powers in the Executive.

Mr. McKAY considered that it would be entirely improper to strike out this clause. It simply gave power to the Executive, in cases where property had been seized, to release it. The law provided for the seizure of property, but not for its forfeiture; therefore, it was proper that the President should have the power to release it, under certain circumstances. In case this amendment prevailed, and the clause was struck out, goods could only be restored by the judgment of courts; and where they had been seized in consequence of a violation of the law, there must be great delay and loss to the citizens in certain cases.

The motion to strike out was then disagreed to.

The second section being read,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to strike out that part of the section which made the bill applicable only to conterminous territories. Mr. F. remarked that it might be said that there was very little danger of getting into any difficulty with countries which did not lie contiguous to the United States; but he thought our legislation ought to be uniform. He had an objection to having a law passed by Congress which subjected his constituents to a rule which was not general, and for this reason he hoped his amendment might prevail.

Mr. HOWARD remarked that it was necessary to shape our legislation to the circumstances in which we were placed. We already had laws which which were applicable to expeditions fitted out for service at sea, and against foreign countries, and it now became necessary to pass laws to preserve our neutrality with conterminous countries, and this law had been introduced to effect that object. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. HOLSEY contended that this bill was about to place us in the same relation to conterminous countries which it did to other foreign countries, if it passed, and urged upon the gentleman from New York to withdraw his proposition to amend.

Mr. FILLMORE sustained his amendment on the ground that the bill created invidious distinctions, which ought never to exist in the legislation of any country.

Mr. PECK called for the yeas and nays on this amendment; but the House refused to order them, and the amendment of Mr. FILLMORE was disagreed to.

Mr. EVERETT moved to strike out that clause which provided that the law should not interfere with the trade authorized to be carried on by the laws of the nations: lost.

Mr. ROBINSON moved to strike out all after the enacting clause to line sixteen, and insert an amendment which he sent to the Chair, providing that in all cases of seizures, affidavit should first be made, and a warrant issued.

Mr. R. urged his amendment on the House, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of making seizures without due course of law, as was proposed to be done by the bill.

Mr. PATTON replied to Mr. R. pointing to the third section of the bill, which provided that immediately after the seizure, a warrant should be obtained in due form from some judicial officer, for the purpose of holding the property seized. This he contended was all that was necessary to guard against the abuse of power, and he argued that if a warrant under oath was to be obtained before seizure, that the law would be wholly ineffectual, as it would in almost every instance, if not in every one, be evaded.

Mr. MENIFEE then addressed the House at some length, in opposition to the bill, on the ground of its unconstitutionality.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. LEGARE, MENIFEE, MAXWELL, and UNDERWOOD; when,

Mr. CUSHMAN said, that wishing to bring the House to a direct vote on the question, he moved the previous question; which was seconded—83 to 41, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. PETRIKEN asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered, and were—yeas 130, nays 45, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

The bill reported this morning for the relief of Potter and Cassedy, of Wilmington, North Carolina, was read a third time and passed.

The bill directing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to ascertain the quantity of land covered by grants made to Anthony Shane and Lewis Godfrey, in section 16, township 14, range 2 east, in Lima district, Ohio, was read a third time and passed.

The bill supplementary to the act for the relief of Paine and Arnold, was also read a third time and passed.

Sundry bills and a joint resolution from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to submit a resolution calling upon the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy, for a return of the names of pension agents, agencies, &c. but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS,

The House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. WALL,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of 1789 as requires the Secretary of State to have the acts of Congress recorded in books provided for that purpose.

Mr. PRENTISS, agreeably to leave, introduced the following bill, which was read a second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A BILL to prohibit the giving or accepting within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person shall, within the District of Columbia, give or send, or cause to be given or sent to any other person, any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever within or without the said District, and such challenge shall be accepted by the other party, and a meeting of the parties thereto shall be had in pursuance thereof, within or without the said District, and either of the said parties shall be killed or mortally wounded in such duel or combat, the surviving party to such challenge, and every person who shall aid or abet in the giving or sending, or causing to be given or sent, such challenge, shall be deemed guilty of murder, and upon conviction thereof in any court competent to the trial thereof, in the said District, shall suffer death.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall give or send, or cause to be given or sent, to any person in the District of Columbia, any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or if any person in said District shall accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall be the bearer of any such challenge, every person so giving or sending, or causing to be given or sent, or accepting such challenge, or being the bearer thereof; and every person aiding or abetting in the giving, sending, or accepting such challenge, shall be deemed guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court competent to try the same in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment, and confined to hard labor in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That if any person shall assault, strike, beat or wound, or cause to be assaulted, stricken, beaten or wounded, any person in the District of Columbia, for declining or refusing to accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall post and publish, or cause to be posted and published, any writing charging any such person so declining or refusing to accept any such challenge, to be a coward, or using any other opprobrious or injurious language therein, tending to degrade and disgrace such person for so declining or refusing such challenge, every person so offending, on conviction thereof in any court competent to the trial thereof, in the said District, shall be punished by confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years, in the discretion of the Court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the oath now prescribed by law to be administered to the grand jury in the District of Columbia, they shall be sworn faithfully and impartially to inquire into, and true presentments make of, all offences against this act.

On introducing this bill, Mr. PRENTISS said that, entertaining the principles and sentiments he did, and representing a people who acknowledge no code or system of law but such as is derived from Divine authority, or from regularly constituted and established civil government, he felt it to be a duty, with which he could not dispense, to introduce this bill. In doing so, (said Mr. P.) I have been moved by no mere transient or fugitive feeling of the moment; by no mere excitement, growing out of a very recent and very lamentable event; though it is somewhat difficult, I must confess, entirely to repress or overcome the emotions which that event has produced. Although the event to which I allude has carried, as we all know it has, lamentation and wo unspeakable, unutterable anguish and agony of heart, to an innocent and unoffending family, and is fitted to awaken, here and every where, sensations of the deepest grief and sorrow; notwithstanding all this, I have nothing to do, nothing to say, concerning the transaction, in my place here. It is past and gone. We cannot recall the dead to life. We cannot repair the wrong and injury which have been done. But we can provide for the future. We can do what becomes us to prevent so fatal, so heart-rending an occurrence hereafter.

Sir, (continued Mr. P.) in bringing in this bill, I have acted, as I have said, from no mere impulse of overwrought sensibility; from no mere temporary excited feeling. I have been influenced by higher, more stable, and lasting motives; by principles of action deeper settled, more permament and enduring; principles which remain the same in all times and under all circumstances. I am influenced upon principles which look upon duelling as a crime; as an offence against high Heaven; forbidden and condemned alike by religion and morality, by the laws of God and man.

Sir, I might here, with no impropriety, speak of the spirit of insubordination and lawless violence which is abroad in the land, infecting and pervading, it would seem, entire communities, threatening the subversion of the established institutions of the country, and which, if not checked and subdued, will, it is to be feared, sooner or later, overthrow all law and all government, and open the way to brutal anarchy and misrule, to scenes of civil strife and disorder, as sanguinary, as terrific, as any which marked the ferocious and bloody annals of revolutionary France.

But, sir, my purpose is confined to a single, a particular object. It is to prohibit and suppress a practice here, which, if not stopped, must ultimately, in addition to other deplorable consequences of a private and social nature, put an end to all freedom of debate and action in your halls of legislation, banish from them all just and rightful authority, and substitute the dominion of mere brute force in its place.

Mr. President, in bringing forward this measure, I repeat I have acted from a high sense of duty. The moral and religious principles in which I have been educated, and which I regard as binding upon me in all circumstances and situations, whether public or private, in which I am placed, would not allow me to hold a seat here, and remain inactive in this matter. And I call upon Senators, upon grave, considerate Senators, head of families, fathers of the land, to interpose their authority and influence to stay a practice as unsuited to the enlightened age in which we live, as it is revolting to the moral and religious feeling of the country. I call upon them by their regard to the rising generation, upon whom the hopes of the country rest; by their regard to the eternal and immutable principles of moral rectitude; by every consideration of justice and humanity; by the duty they owe to God and their country, to give their aid and support to a measure demanded by the moral sense of the nation, and no less necessary to maintain freedom of discussion here, than it is essential to personal security, and to the preservation of law, liberty, and social order.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act for the relief of Allen R. Moore.
An act for the relief of Edward Burgess.
An act for the relief of Abraham Lansing.
An act for the relief of Sarah Murphy.
An act for the relief of John Kreps.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Senate then took up the Independent Treasury bill, when Mr. STRANGE rose and occupied the floor until 4 o'clock in favor of the bill, and gave way for a motion to adjourn before he had concluded his argument.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 3, 1838.

The first business in order, was the consideration of the Senate bill, in relation to the Orphan's Court of the District of Columbia, reported yesterday from the Committee on the District.

The question pending, was on making the duration of appointments for four years, reported as an amendment by Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on the District.

This amendment was briefly opposed by Messrs. PATTON and MERCER, and supported Messrs. PETRIKEN and DAWSON, when Mr. D. to meet the objection, moved that the operation of the act itself should be limited to four years, after which Congress might reject or approve of the other proposition. This was briefly opposed by Mr. PATTON, when, on motion of Mr. DAWSON, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till Tuesday next.

[The objection to the amendment was based on the ground that the authority of Congress to legislate on this matter was derived from the Constitution, under which all judges were appointed during good behavior, and that this was a United States court, and should be governed by that provision. To this it was replied, that the court was antecedent to the Constitution, having been originally organized under the laws of Maryland, prior to the cession of the District, and Congress, as the local legislature of the District, was not restricted by that clause of the Constitution.]

Reports from committees were then called for.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMAS reported the Senate bill to prevent the counterfeiting of gold, silver and copper coin.

On motion of Mr. CORWIN the bill to change the time of holding the Circuit Courts of the United States, for the seventh circuit, on the Speaker's table, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. MORGAN reported a bill for the relief of Letitia Crane.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. MERCER reported a bill giving the assent of Congress to the amendatory act of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. MONTGOMERY made unfavorable reports on the petition of the Clerks in the General Post Office, praying additional compensation; on the petition of William Walker; and on that of William Cater; which were severally laid on the table.

SCHOOL LANDS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour then came us, being the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, proposing to set apart, for the benefit of all the States of the Union, a certain quantity of public land.

Mr. J. continued his remarks till the expiration of the morning hour, when

The CHAIR announced the private orders.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he hoped he would have the assent of the chairman of the Committee of Claims, and the leave of the House, for a suspension of the private bills, in order to go on with the appropriation bills; and he made that motion accordingly.

The CHAIR was about dividing the House; when,

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 121, nays 36.

So the rules were suspended.

The CHAIR laid before the House the following communications:

1. From the Secretary of War, an additional report, in answer to the resolution of the 11th of October last, transmitting certain correspondence not heretofore transmitted with General Jesup, accidentally omitted in the report thereof heretofore made to the House.

On motion of Mr. M'KAY: laid on the table.

2. From the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 2d July, 1836, requiring testimony to be taken, and statements to be made to the House, respecting the claim of John Jones, for work done on Pea Patch Island.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, referred to the Committee of Claims.

PENSION BILL.

The House then took up the "bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1838," the question being on its engrossment.

Mr. CURTIS then reiterated his charges in relatoin to the use of the balances in their hands by the pension agents.

The debate was further continued on the same side by Mr. CHAMBERS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, and expressed the hope that the two gentlemen would keep in mind their sound and convincing arguments against bank agencies; and when the bill came up, which he had the honor to report yesterday, to dispense with all bank agencies in the management of the public revenues, give it their hearty assent. Mr. C. entered into a variety of statements on the subject. He suggested a remedy, and the only one. The large balances said to be in the hands of pension agents, grew out of the accumulation of past pensions remaining unclaimed, and a law should be passed providing for their being returned to the Treasury after they had been unclaimed for twelve months. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, he should do his best to secure the introduction and adoption of such a remedy. Mr. C. also sent to the Clerk's table, to be read to the House, a number of letters from agents to the Commissioner, which went to establish the position he had taken, and to show that the money was not used by the agents individually, but by the banks in which the money was deposited.

Mr. CUSHMAN said he had heard no objection made against this bill, but all seemed to concur in the necessity of its passage.

Mr. BELL. But not to the whole amount.

Mr. CUSHMAN had, nevertheless, heard no argument against the necessity of its passage. Mr. C. then went on to reply to Mr. CURTIS, and in vindication of Gov. Hill.

Mr. HAYNES said he had devoted to this discussion all the attention which the state of his health would permit. He had been gratified by the course of the discussion, and agreed entirely with those who objected to the use of the public money by officers and agents to whom it was committed.

From the manner in which the debate had been conducted by some gentlemen, it would seem that Solomon was far less wise than mankind had generally considered him, and that those who objected to the use of the public money by pension agents, had indeed discovered something new under the sun. But he had risen, in part, for the purpose of stating that the fact is not so. That ever since the public money was taken out of the hands of the officers of the Government, it had been used by the agents to whom it had been entrusted.

The use of the public money by pension agents was not, therefore, an exception to the general practice. The custodiar of the public money had had the use of the public money ever since the change of custody to banks from the officers of the Government. To show that the agents of the Government have been compensated by the use of the public money, it was only necessary to refer to the amount of public money in the custody of the United States Bank for fifteen years, from 1818 to 1832, during which period the average amount was near seven millions of dollars—not less than six millions six or seven hundred thousand dollars. At an interest of five per cent. per annum, less than the interest required on loans by any bank within his knowledge, the compensation upon the use of this amount of the public money would be about five millions of dollars. There was no complaint then, there is none now, to such use of the public money by the Bank of the United States, by those who so strongly object to its use by pension agents.

He agreed most heartily with those who objected to this practice, and warned gentlemen who should not vote for the Treasury bill referred to by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that they would be confronted by their own argument. For his part he was for cutting up the abuse entirely and forever, by no longer permitting the use of the public money by those to whose care it might be committed. He hoped, when the Treasury bill should be taken up, he should find gentlemen who are opposed to permitting pension agents to use the public money, standing side by side with him, and that they would, as he should, show their faith by their works.

The debate was further continued by Mr. MARVIN, when

Mr. TAYLOR said that having heard no objection to this bill, it could be nothing more than a waste of time to be discussing matters which were unconnected with it, and which had better be discussed on some other and more fitting occasion than on the appropriation bill to pay the old pensioners.

The House seconded the demand for the previous question—65 to 63.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; and pending the Chair ascertaining if they were ordered,

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn being taken by tellers, resulted—ayes 71, noes 70, the CHAIR, under the ninth rule, voting in the negative, the motion to adjourn was lost.

The question then recurring on ordering the yeas and nays, they were refused, and the main question ordered without a division; and on that question, being on the third reading of the bill—

Mr. TURNEY called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and the bill was then read a third time and passed without a division.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. W. remarked that he was aware that, by the rules of the House, resolutions calling upon a head of a Department for information, must lie over one day; but having been instructed by a respectable class of his constituents of both political parties, directly interested, to seek through this channel the information called for, he hoped the House would consent to take the vote now.

The CHAIR here reminded Mr. W. that, by the late rule, resolutions offered to-day are not debateable.

Mr. CARTER offered the following preamble and resolution, which lie over under the rule:

Whereas purity in the administration of a free Government can only be maintained by the observance of strict economy in the public expenditures; and

Whereas extravagance and prodigality in the management and disbursements of the public revenue are the sure indications of an unjust and corrupt Government; and whereas a free Government cannot exist where public officers and agents are multiplied beyond the demands of the public service, merely to gratify the increasing desire for public employment, and where the public administration relies for its support more upon the interest and attachment of dependants, and the amount of patronage under its control, than upon the impartial discernment of an enlightened community; and

Whereas public officers and employments have increased, of late, in a degree unprecedented at any former period of the Government; and

Whereas the public expenditures have increased within the last nine years, from thirteen millions of dollars, that being near the average of the annual expenditures in time of peace up to the year 1829, to upwards of thirty-two millions since that time; and

Whereas, these facts clearly indicate a great degree of laxity and weakness in the public administration, or a wilful abuse of the powers of Government, and a determination to rule by the use of patronage. Therefore,

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into, and report to this House, the causes which have led to the late extraordinary increase of public officers and agents, and the alarming increase of public expenditure within the last nine years, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for surveying the harbor of South Harwich, with a view to improve the same.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS,

Resolved, That the Secretaries of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, be directed to report to this House the names of all the persons appointed as agents for the payment of pensions from the first attempt to transfer the payment of pensions from the late Bank of the United States to other agents for said payments to the present time; specifying the authority by which such appointments have been made; the forms of the commissions issued to such agents; the sums of public moneys advanced or otherwise paid to such agents for said payments; and the dates of all such advances and payments; and the balances remaining credited to each of them at the end of each quarter; the compensation, if any, allowed to said agents for such services; the banks with which they have been respectively connected; the offices, whether under authority of the United States, or of the separate States, held by such agents; at the same time, when charged with the pension agency, and the compensation which they have received therefor.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing on the pension roll of the United States the name of Elizabeth Durant, of Hinsdale, Mass. widow of Thomas Durant, of Middlefield, Mass. a Revolutionary soldier, deceased.

Mr. ADAMS of Massachusetts, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the letter and petition of John V. Brown and twelve others, from Rocky Mount, Franklin county, Virginia, praying, for reasons therein assigned, for the arraignment at the bar of the House, and expulsion of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, a member of this House, be printed, with the names of the signers thereto, and referred to a committee of nine members to consider and report thereon, with liberty to send for persons and papers.

Mr. A. was about to address the Chair in support of the resolution, when the SPEAKER reminded him that, under the order of the House, if any resolution was likely to cause debate, it must be laid over.

Mr ADAMS said, that as the resolution referred to a question of privilege, he presumed that part of the rule did not apply to this resolution.

The CHAIR, having considered the resolution, decided that, as a question of privilege, its consideration would be in order.

Mr. RENCHER, of North Carolina, moved th preliminary question of consideration, viz: whethe the House would consider the resolution?

The CHAIR said that the question of reconsideration would take precedence of all others.

Mr. ADAMS said that the resolution concerned his own privilege as a member of the House, and of the House also.

Mr. RENCHER said he would withdraw his motion for the question of consideration.

Mr. ADAMS then called for the reading of the letter and memorial to which the resolutions referred. And they were read as follows:

ROCKY MOUNT, FRANKLIN COUNTY, VIRGINIA, Feb. 26, 1838.

Mr. ADAMS: As the representative of the interests and wishes of the people of the whole United States, and defending in theory so ably, and in practice so fully, the hallowed right of petition from your countrymen, we whose names are hereunto subscribed, respectfully ask you to present the following humble and needful petition to the Congress of the United States for immediate action:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Whereas, for a long time we have seen with deep regret the course pursued by our distinguished fellow-citizen, the Hon. John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts, upon the deeply interesting question of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and acknowledging as we do the rights of petition, and the duty of Congress to attend to all petitions coming from the freemen of the United States, and as it is clearly and fully conceded by all that you have the constitutional power to keep order in your body, and to preserve harmony in the country, by all proper means, we repectfully and humbly pray that, as the aforesaid JOHN QUINCY ADAMS has pursued and is pursuing a course upon the aforesaid subject, in our opinions morally and politically wrong, and calculated, certainly, to stir up the deadliest strife between the North and South, and finally to invade our beloved country in the horrors of a civil war, and to lead to a dissolution of the Union, you do arraign him at the bar of the House, and formally and forever expel him from your most honorable body, if sufficient evidence appear to justify your adopting such a measure. Your petitioners deem it unnecessary to lay before Congress any labored argument in favor of this important measure, and will content themselves simply by stating that no feelings, but motives of patriotism, and a deep desire to silence the discussion of this most absorbing and dangerous question, here induce them to appeal to you, in their popular right, to exercise this constitutional power, clearly vested in you by the very instrument itself.

They humbly and most earnestly pray that this their petition will be attended to by your very honorable body; and, with great reverence and respect, sign themselves your most obedient servants.

Mr. STUART of Virginia, said that the memorial appeared to have come from his own district, but he had never heard any thing of it; he wished to hear the names of the signers.

[They were read by the Clerk.]

Mr. STUART then said that he was satisfied the names were all fictitious, and moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which was agreed to, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

Bell, a captain in the army of the Revolution, of seven years' half pay, agreeably to the resolutions of Congress of May 15, 1778, and August 24, 1780, with such interest thereon as would have accrued had a certificate for the amount been issued and subscribed upon the principles of the funding act.

On motion of Mr. NOYES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire if any alteration is required in the law regulating the pay of officers in the army, to render it more conformable to that of officers in the navy of assimilated rank.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from the town of Unity, in the State of Maine, to the town of Thorndike, in said State.

After the resolutions, petitions and memorials were then called for, in the reverse order, from the States and Territories, and a number was presented, as follows:

Also, resolutions of a public meeting held in the county of St. Joseph, on the subject of preemption rights to the public lands. Also, petitions from sundry inhabitants of St. Joseph and Kalamazoo counties, praying for the passage of a preemption law.]

ARKANSAS.

Mr. YELL.

MISSOURI.

Mr. MILLER.

[Mr. MILLER presented the following petitions: the petition of Wm. H. Henton and others, praying the establishment of a mail route from Booneville, in Cooper county, Missouri, by the way of Georgetown, Rives Court House, Oseola, Sarcoxie, in Perry county, in said State; thence by the way of the Seneca Mills to Fort Gibson, on Arkansas river: also, the petition of Wm. Hugdins and others, praying the establishment of a mail route from the post office of Madison creek by Utica, Livingston county, Missouri, by Goliton, in the county of Davis, to the city of Far West, in the county of Caldwell, in said State: also, the petition of the heirs of Wm. Young, deceased, praying Congress to grant them compensation for services rendered by the said Wm. Young, during his life time: also, the petition of Michael Gloss, praying Congress to refund him a certain sum of money on account of a tract of land entered, as he believes, through mistake.

ALABAMA.

Messrs. LAWLER, LEWIS and CHAPMAN.

[Mr. LAWLER presented a memorial and certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of the annexation of Texas, and moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. ADAMS moved to refer them to a select committe.

The first motion taking precedence, Mr. A. called for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered, and were—yeas 109, nays 40.

So the memorial and resolutions were laid on the table.]

ILLINOIS.

Messrs. SNYDER, MAY, and CASEY.

[Mr. MAY presented a number of petitions for the establishment of mail routes. Also, a petition from a convention of citizens of Lasalle county, Illinois, praying for a grant of lands for the purpose of improving the navigation of Fox river. Also, a petition from a number of citizens of Jo Daviess county, praying for a donation of four sections of land, for the purpose of endowing a manual labor college. Also, a petition praying for the passage of a pre-emption law.]

[Mr. SNYDER presented the memorial of three hundred and fifty-nine voters, citizens of St. Clair county, in the State of Illinois, "praying that Congress may adopt some measure by which all connection between banks and the General Government may be totally dissolved." Mr. SNYDER said he was well acquainted with nearly every person whose name appears to this memorial; they were highly respectable and influential men. He recognised the names of the judges of the county court and their clerk, the sheriff of that county, two lawyers, eight or ten justices of the peace, one member and one ex-member of the Legislature, with many other of the most influential men in that county. Neither could he (Mr. S.) omit to mention the name of John Reynolds, his distinguished predecessor, doubtless favorably known to many honorable members of this House, who had also placed his name to this hard-money memorial. Mr. SNYDER said he was thus particular in stating the number and character of the memorialists and their object, because he had noticed a statement in the Vandalia Register, printed in Illinois, stating "that a paper had been transmitted to him, (Mr. SNYDER) one of the representatives in Congress, from St. Clair county, signed by 800 voters, being a majority of the legal voters of that county, desiring him (Mr. S.) to vote for the divorce bill." This article, Mr. SNYDER said, was going the rounds of the western papers, and he thought it his duty to correct the misrepresentation; the more so because that print had, on other occasions, been guilty of similar conduct towards him. Mr. SNYDER moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed.

Mr. SNYDER presented the papers of William B. Livesey, of Washington county, in the State of Illinois, asking that he may be permitted to re-locate eighty acres of land entered by mistake. Also, the petition of Peter Samuel Jaccord, of Johnson county, in the State of Illinois, on the same subject; both of which he moved to refer to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, the petition of George Kinder, Jubilee Posey, and Joel Whitesides, of Madison county, State of Illinois, praying Congress to authorize the receiver of public moneys at Edwardsville, Illinois, to pay them the amovnt of money and interest which they paid over and about the amount of land purchased by them, owing to a mistake in the land office books of the real number of acres contained in the respective tracts: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.]

[Mr. CASEY presented the petition of sundry citizens of Iroquois county, Illinois, in relation to a mail route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, the papers in the case of Eldridge Coles, for a horse lost while in the ranger's service: referred to the Committee of Claims. Also, the papers in relation to the claim of Davis and Forman, for services rendered the Government: referred to the Committee of Claims.]

INDIANA.

Messrs. BOON, RARIDEN, GRAHAM, HEROD, EWING, and WHITE.

[Mr. GRAHAM presented the petition of Thomas Maxwell of Washington county, Indiana, praying a pension for revolutionary services: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. Also, the claim of Hannibal Durham of Indiana, for a horse lost in the military service of the United States, and the claim of Daniel S. Beem of Indiana, for a horse lost in the same service: referred to the Committee of Claims. Also, resolutions of the General Assembly of Indiana, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their best efforts to procure the passage of a law providing that the notes of specie-paying banks be received in payment of public lands: ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

LOUISIANA.

Messrs. GARLAND and JOHNSON,

OHIO.

Messrs. HARPER, HUNTER, KILGORE, ALEXANDER, MASON, RIDGWAY, DUNCAN, LEADBETTER, SHEPLOR, and GOODE.

H. Beecher and 36 other citizens of the same county, for the same purpose: also, the petition of 26 males and 30 females of the county of Muskingum, Ohio, for the same purpose: also, the petition of the same, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia: also, the petition of Paul Hahn, of the county of Muskingum, Ohio, praying a pension: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.]

[Mr. HUNTER presented a petition from O. Follet and other citizens of Huron county, Ohio, requesting Congress to reject every proposition and measure for the annexation of Texas: referred to the Committee of Foreign Affairs. Also, from G. W. West and others, for the establishment of a post route from Norwalk, Huron county, to Plymouth, Richland county, Ohio: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, from Thomas Treat and others, for a mail route from Melmore, in the county of Seneca, to New Haven, in the county of Huron, Ohio: same reference. Also, from L. Snyder and others, for a mail route from Tiffin to Fort Findley, in the county of Hancock, Ohio: same reference. Also, from J. Meredith and others, to abolish postages on newspapers: same reference. Also moved to refer a petition presented at the Second Session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, to establish a post route from Tiffin to Resden, to the same committee. Also presented a resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio on the subject of the "Maumee and Western Reserve road," and moved its reference to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Also, a resolution from the same, expressing the opinion of that body in relation to measures affecting their prosperity, and disclaiming the power to give binding instructions, etc.—(withdrawn, on the ground that it had been previously presented.) Also, additional papers in the case of David Carswell: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.]

[Mr. KILGORE presented the following petitions, to wit: The petition of 39 legal voters of Harrison county, Ohio, for the repeal of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st December last, touching abolition petitions, etc. The petition of 93 citizens and legal voters of the same county and State, against the admission of any new State into the Union, whose constitution tolerates domestic slavery. The petition of 40 citizens of the county of Jefferson, Ohio, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The petition of 78 citizens of the nineteenth Congressional district, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. At this stage, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, the amendments of the Senate to the House bill in relation to the Northern frontier, were committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, March 5, 1838.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of Jonathan Thompson, late collector of the customs at New York, praying the restoration of his official bonds, for reasons set forth in the petition: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of Indiana, praying that the lands through which the Wabash and Erie Canal passes may be exposed to sale: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of E. C. Watson of New York, calling the attention of Congress, in respectful and feeling language, as Mr. C. said, to the distressed condition of the country, and proposing the establishment of a great national corporation, to be called the United States Internal Improvement and Manufacturing Loan Office, with a capital of one hundred millions of dollars, to issue bank notes of from five dollars to one thousand dollars, and to have the custody of the public money: referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Captain Britton Evans, of the Philadelphia volunteers, now in Florida, praying reimbursement for his property, which was lost in consequence of the wreck of the vessel in which he took passage: referred to the Committee on Claims

Mr. LYON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Jackson, Lenawee and Calhoun counties, in the State of Michigan, praying Congress to establish a mail route on a new State road, laid out fifty-nine miles in length, from Tecumseh, in Lenawee county, to Marshall, in Calhoun county, through the villages of Brooklyn, Jefferson, Spring Arbor, Acker's Mills, Concord, Albion, and Berne, in that State: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William Wells, and a large number of citizens of Buffalo and its vicinity, praying for the passage of a law to pay Mr. Wells for the steamboat Caroline, which was destroyed by the British: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT also presented the petition of Benjamin Gover, praying for a pension, as a soldier of the Revolution: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of William E. Dayton, and other citizens of New York, remonstrating against the Independent Treasury bill, and praying for the establishment of a national bank: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr CLAY of Kentucky presented a petition from the citizens of Hampshire county, in Virginia, which he read. This petition states that the course pursued by the Post Office Department in exacting specie, is seeking to coerce the people to do what is physically impossible; and that, unless a change is effected in the Post Office regulations, they will speedily be deprived of all benefit from the United States mail, shut out from correspondence with their friends and the information the newspapers afford. It states, also, that Stockton and Stokes, while they are exacting specie on their contracts from the country postmasters, are deluging the county with shin-plasters, redeemable only in current bank notes or stage fare.

Mr. C. moved to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GRUNDY said, as it related to specie, he thought it would be better to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAY said he did not care to what committee it went. Of one thing he was satisfied, the result would be the same let it go where it might in that body. He thought, however, the use of the term shin-plasters might have secured it a favorable reception from certain quarters. He expressed himself satisfied with any reference which they might please to give it.

Mr. YOUNG presented the proceedings of the Board of Public Works of the State of Illinois, on the subject of the progress of internal improvements in that State: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBBINS presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, remonstrating against the passage of the Independent Treasury bill: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Wisconsin to incorporate the State Bank of Wisconsin and Prairie du Chien, made an unfavorable report thereon, accompanied by a joint resolution disapproving and disaffirming the same.

NEUTRAL RELATIONS.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill from the House of Representatives "to amend an act entitled 'an act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, reported the same with amendments, which were read.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that it was certainly a matter of some importance that this bill should be acted on speedily; and as the amendments which the Committee on Foreign Relations had proposed were very short, and very simple, he was ready at any time to give an explanation of them. If any Senator, however, was desirous of having the action of the Senate on this subject postponed until the amendments could be printed, he would not object; but if no postponement was desired, he would ask that the bill and amendments be now considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill and amendments were then taken up, and the first amendment was read as follows:

Strike out from the eighth and ninth lines of the first section the words, "other means or materials," and insert instead thereof the words, "any arms or munitions of war;" and, in the same section, after the word "enterprise," in the tenth line, insert the following words, to wit: "against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, conterminous with the United States, and with whom they are at peace."

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that the first section of this bill as it came from the House was entirely new, and had not been a subject of consideration by the Senate, when this question was before it, some five or six weeks ago. It would be observed that it introduced new provisions into our neutality laws, the extent of which could not well be foreseen. It was not confined to the particular exigency which had called for the passage of this act, but was co-extensive with the whole world, and might operate very injuriously against the commerce of the United States.

He would endeavor to present as clearly as he could to the Senate, the nature of this provision.

Under the 6th section of the Neutrality Act of April 20, 1818, any person who shall, within the territory of the United States, "begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise," against a friendly power, was punishable by a fine not exceeding $3,000, and imprisonment not exceeding three years. The 8th section of the same act conferred upon the President the power of employing the army, the navy, and the militia of the United States, to prevent "the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise," from our territory, against any power with which we should be at peace. The Senate will observe that this power of prevention was not to be exerted until the expedition had been prepared, and was ready to leave the United States for the purpose of accomplishing the object of its destination.

Although it was rendered criminal for any person "to provide or prepare the means" for such an enterprise, and after a regular trial and conviction, the offender was liable to severe punishment, yet the framers of the act of 1818, which was admirably drawn, did not deem it necessary to authorize the President to direct a seizure, in the first instance, of every article of every description which might be intended to be used as "the means" for conducting such an expedition. The Committee on Foreign Relations were of opinion that it might be very inconvenient to our citizens to entrust executive officers with such a broad and sweeping authority. Hence, in the bill which had passed the Senate, there was no authority conferred upon these officers to seize any articles except arms and munitions of war, and vessels or vehicles fitted out with apparent hostile intentions against a friendly conterminous power, and which were about to be sent, or to pass across the interior frontiers of the United States.

In the first section of the House bill, now before the Senate, none of these limitations were to be found, either in regard to the articles which might be seized, or the foreign countries to which they might be destined. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or inspector of the customs in all the ports of the United States, every marshal or deputy marshal, and every other person whom the President might empower for the purpose, was authorized and required to seize and detain, not merely arms and munitions of war, but any other "means or materials" provided for such an expedition, no matter whether it was destined for Europe, Asia, Africa, or America. The authority was given in the most broad and general terms. Provisions of all kinds, clothing, and every other article which might minister to the wants and comforts of such a military expedition as the bill contemplated, were thus made the subjects of seizure. How easily a power so extensive, especially when conferred upon such a host of subordinate officers, might be abused, every Senator could at once perceive. Merchants who had fitted out vessels to trade with foreign countries in a state of war might be thus harassed and annoyed; and that too without any good reason. The present exigency demanded no such general change in our neutrality laws; perhaps in this particular, it demanded no change at all. What was that exigency? An insurrection had broken out in Upper and Lower Canada against the British Colonial Government. These two Provinces, together with Texas and Mexico, were conterminous with the United States. The duties of good neighborhood, the preservation of peace and quiet along the borders, required that the rights of our citizens, under the law of nations, should be abridged in furnishing arms and munitions of war to the insurgents. A few plain and simple, but precise provisions had been adopted by the Senate, confined to the particular case in point, and other similar cases which might arise, to prevent our citizens from sending vessels or vehicles, arms or munitions of war across the border, intended to be employed in aiding the insurgents in their hostile attempts.

Mr. B. said there was no more fruitful source of error in legislation, than to make general and indefinite provisions, when the evil to be remedied was confined to a particular and special case. You could never know to what extent your law would proceed in practice. You would thus often do more harm by embracing cases which you had not intended, than you would do good by remedying existing evils.

Considering the urgent necessity of the present crisis, and the danger that the passage of any bill might be defeated by a collision of opinion between the two Houses, the committee had determined not to move a rejection of the first section of the bill from the House. They had contended themselves with proposing such amendments as would confine its operation within proper limits. According to these amendments, the articles which might be seized were restricted to arms and munitions of war; and their places of destination would not be the world generally, but only conterminous countries. If any Senator required a further explanation, he would cheerfully give it.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he considered the amendments offered such as under all the circumstances ought to be adopted. There were, he said, two considerations which, on general principles, recommended the adoption of the amendments. The first was, that the power of the Executive was probably too much extended by the bill, without the changes introduced, and the other, that the right of the citizen to conduct foreign trade and commerce was too much abridged. The subject had been so long before Congress, and there appeared such necessity for the immediate passage of the bill, that he fully concurred with the honorable chairman in expressing the hope that it might at once be finally disposed of.

Mr. NORVELL said he would like to propound one question to the honorable chairman. It was well known, said Mr. N. that these patriots, as they were called by some, adopted a mode of operation extremely difficult to detect. They were in the habit of procuring wagons like those used by the tin pedlers, in which were secreted arms and munitions of war; and these were driven over the lines, or hidden in the Maumee swamps, from whence they could be taken at pleasure. Mr. N. wished to know if there was any clause in the bill which would reach this case so as to prevent any violation of our neutrality laws?

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, that the bill did make a precise provision in its second section, to meet the case proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The second amendment was then read as follows:

Section 2. Strike out the proviso at the end of this section, and insert in its stead the following: "Provided that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with any trade in arms or munitions of war, conducted in vessels by sea with any foreign port or place whatever, which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this act, under the law of nations, and the provisions of the act hereby amended."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that a short explanation of this amendment was necessary. The second section of the bill seemed to be intended as a substitute for the first and second sections of the bill which had passed the Senate. Our bill had been confined to citizens of the United States: the bill of the House embraced all persons. We had believed that of the United States prevented their own citizens from aiding in insurrectionary movements in neighboring provinces or countries, we had performed our duty. He need scarcely state that under the law of nations, it was lawful for citizens of the United States to sell arms and munitions of war to foreigners, without regard to the use which was intended to be made of them. If they were captured in proceeding to a foreign country, this was the fate of war, and the foreign purchaser must suffer the loss. We had not intended to abridge this trade: and hence our bill had confined the seizures to arms and munitions of war belonging to citizens of the United States.

The provisions of the House bill might essentially interfere with our foreign commerce in arms and munitions of war, unless they were confined to the particular objects which we all had in view. For example, Mexico was a country conterminous with the United States. Suppose the existence of a civil war there, and the opponents of the Government to have obtained possession of the port and city of Vera Cruz. Under this bill, neither citizens of the United States nor foreigners could carry cargoes of arms or munitions of war to that city from any of our ports, for the purpose of selling them to the party in the civil war opposed to the Government, because it would be notorious that they were intended to be employed in carrying on military operations within the territory of a friendly power; and yet such a trade had always existed.

The object of the proposed amendment was to preserve this trade to our citizens, by confining the operation of the second section of the bill to the interior frontiers of the United States, leaving the trade by sea in arms and munitions of war to be regulated as it had been heretofore under the act of 1818.

He might observe that there was a palpable inconsistency between the second section itself and the proviso to it. Whilst the second section clearly and properly abridged the rights of individuals to trade in arms and munitions of war, under the law of nations, for the purpose of securing peace and harmony with friendly neighboring powers, the proviso, as it stood, declared that nothing in the act contained should be so construed as to interfere with any such trade at present sanctioned by the law of nations.

The third amendment was then read as follows:

Section three, line twelve, insert after the word "time" the words, "not exceeding ten days."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that, in almost every respect the House had adopted a much stronger measure than the Senate had deemed necessary. We did believe that where a man's property was seized upon suspicion, no matter how strong, if he would give bond and good security, in double its value, that it should not be employed in violating the provisions of the law, that it ought to be immediately restored to his possession. The House had adopted a different opinion. Under the provisions of their bill, at least three months must elapse before arms and munitions of war could be restored to the owner, upon his giving such a bond and security. The proposed amendment was intended to correct what he could not but believe was a mere omission in the House. As the third section now stood, the officer or person who had seized the property might hold it as long as he himself deemed a reasonable time without applying to the Judge for a warrant for its detention. The committee thought that some limit ought to be fixed to his discretion. The proposed amendment, therefore, provided that he should make this application to the Judge for a warrant within a reasonable time, not exceeding ten days from the date of the seizure.

The fourth amendment was then read and adopted, without debate; and is as follows.

SEC. 7. After the words "reason to believe in the second line," insert as follows: that the provisions of this act have been or are likely to be violated.

The fifth amendment was then read as follows:

And the following as a new section.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for the period of two years, and no longer.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the last amendment proposed by the committee was, to limit the existence of this act to a period of two years. He was not at all satisfied with the bill; and he believed he might say as much for the Committee on Foreign Relations. But the crisis demanded that we should adopt some measure promptly; and they had deemed it necessary to take this measure, with all its imperfections, rather than do nothing. Such seemed to be the only alternative, under existing circumstances. There was one complaint, at least, which could not justly be made against the bill; and that was, that it did not give sufficient power to the Executive. The committee were opposed to making this a permanent law, and placing it as such upon our statute book, as part of our code to regulate our neutral relations with foreign Governments. He hoped that before two years should elapse, some well-considered and carefully-drawn bill might be adopted on the subject, which should be strictly confined in its provisions to our contiguous neighbors along our interior frontiers.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That so much of the annual report of the Secretary of War to the President as relates to the management and safe-keeping, or investment of money in the hands of officers of the Government to the several Indian tribes, or to individual Indians, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying to the merchants of Mobile the sums paid by them in costs on the extension of duty bonds, in conformity with the provisions of an act of Congress approved the 16th October, 1837.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the Portage Canal Company of Wisconsin Territory, the right of pre-emption to fractional section 9, and the part of section 4 which lies between the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, both in township 12 north, range 9 east, for the purpose of enabling the said company to construct a canal between the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, as provided by the act of the Legislature of Michigan, approved March 7, 1834.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The charter of the company, together with sundry other documents, were referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to communicate to the Senate, with as little delay as practicable, a copy of the recent survey of Lieut. Stansbury of the corps of engineers, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois and Kaskaskias rivers, with appropriate drawings of the rivers at those points where the navigation may be obstructed, and the estimate of expenses to remove the same.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,

Resolved, That the Secretaries of the Navy, War, and Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the names of all persons who in and since the year 1832 have been appointed to the office of pension agents by said departments respectively, stating the authority under which such appointments have been made, copies of all instructions to such agents, the form of the commission or letters of appointment, the sums of money advanced to such agents respectively, for the purpose of paying pensions, and the times of such advances, the amount paid annually at each office, the average balances remaining in the hands of such agents, and also the exact balance, as near as the same can be ascertained; in the hands of each agent on the 1st day of this month, distinguishing and stating separately the sums advanced under each pension law; and also the copies of all letters from pension agents requiring advances, or in any way alluding to their own compensation.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Jonathan Davis.

The bill for the relief of Mary A. Patrick; and

The bill for the relief of Philip Revere and his legal representatives.

The Senate then took up the Independent Treasury bill as the order of the day, and Mr. MERRICK, who had the floor, addressed the Senate at great length in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the amendment offered by Mr. RIVES.

After which the bill was laid over informally; and

Mr. BUCHANAN having stated that the amendments to the Neutrality bill from the House were engrossed, it was taken up, read the third time, and passed as amended.

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business. After a short secret session, the doors were opened, and

The bill for the relief of Peter Bargy, jr. and

The bill to establish an additional land office in the Territory of Wisconsin, were severally taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to establish a surveyor general's office in the State of Illinois, was taken up and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. WALKER, BUCHANAN, CLAY of Alabama, YOUNG, and SMITH of Indiana, took part, the question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading was taken, and resulted—yeas 16, nays 10.

No quorum voting,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, March 6, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to present a memorial from 220 citizens, stated to consist of most respectable men of all parties, in relation to the late duel, designated by them as "an atrocious murder," with a view, he said, to refer it to the select committee appointed to investigate that subject. At the request of Mr. A. the memorial was read.

Objection being made to receiving the memorial—

Mr. A. moved a suspension of the rules, and askep for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 43.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. ADAMS then presented the memorial, and, on his motion, it was referred to the Select Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRFIELD said he had received a similar petition, and asked leave to present it for a similar reference.

Objection being again made,

Mr. F. moved a suspension of the rules, which was agreed to—ayes 107, noes not counted, and the memorial was presented, and took the same reference as the foregoing.

Mr. WISE, on leave, presented a memorial for a Revolutionary claim.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the vacancy on the Committee on the Judiciary, occasioned by the death of Mr. Cilley, was directed to be filled up.

Mr. CHAMBERS asked leave to submit a resolution, directing hereafter the daily hour of meeting of the House to be 10 o'clock, a. m. Objection being made, Mr. C. moved a suspension of the rule, but it was rejected. Mr. C. then gave notice that he should renew the motion from day to day till it succeeded.

Reports from committees were then called for.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred various memorials relating to the Currency and a National Bank, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the Finances, recommending further provisions for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, submit the following report:

The suspension of specie payments by the banks throughout the United States, in May last, compelled the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the Constitution and existing laws, to dispense with their agency and the use of their notes, and to employ the officers of Government as the fiscal agents of his Department. The banks refused to pay the large surplus deposited with them in the only medium authorized by law, and the expenditures of Government would have been generally suspended, had not the public creditors consented to receive their dues in drafts upon banks which paid them only in irredeemable notes.

Under such extraordinary circumstances, it became obviously necessary to devise some mode of managing our finances which would prevent similar embarrassments in future. The President, accordingly, in discharging his constitutional duty, recommended, at the late session, a series of measures, calculated, as your committee believe, to give stability to the operations of the Treasury, and, at the same time, to relieve the trade and banks of the country from a connection mutually disadvantageous to them and to Government.

These recommendations were opposed by the friends of a National Bank, and by others who desired to renew our fiscal relations with the State Banks. It was, however, admitted that there was no prospect of the establishment of a national institution for some years to come, if ever; and the explosion of the State bank deposite system was too recent to warrant the expectation of its renewal at an early period, if at all. Notwithstanding, however, the condition of our finances, and the urgent necessity of some regulation to render our Treasury independent of banks, and provide additional guards for the safe-keeping of the public money, the Treasury was left amidst all its embarrassments. The same regulations are again recommended by the President; and nothing has, in the meantime, occurred to induce the committee to change their opinion, that their adoption is not only essential to the safety and independence of the public Treasury, but to the stability of trade and of every sound bank in the Union.

The events of the last three years have produced a general conviction that the public money should not be employed by banks or any other institutions, in commercial discounts, however profitable its use might be to their stockholders. During the speculations of 1835 and 1836, the deposite banks stimulated speculation to excess, and in 1837 suddenly withdrew their accommodations to meet the public demands. The accumulation and distribution of the surplus were among the most powerful causes of that alarm which produced the suspension of specie payments. When banks thus employ the public money, they deal in a fund over which they have no control, and its constant transfers and fluctuations embarrass their commercial operations. Even Government itself cannot regulate its amount, anticipate its fluctuations, or the demands upon the Treasury. Under any system of revenue, the transactions of Government would embarrass trade wherever they are united. But in this country, the connection is particularly disastrous, owing to the extraordinary fluctuations in our revenue. Our income is derived from customs and public lands, and is violently affected by the rapid growth of our wealth, commerce, and population. Under our revenue laws, as they have heretofore existed, we have repeatedly had a large surplus at one moment, and immediately after a bankrupt Treasury. By renewing the connection with banks, we shall make the public revenue again instrumental in exciting speculation, embarrassing trade, and injuring every class of the community.

It is wholly immaterial whether the public money is employed in trade by State or National bank agents. The public must, in either case, suffer from the fluctuations of our income, and the occasional efforts of the banks to meet the Treasury demands for transfer or disbursement. Had the Bank of the United States been continued as the agent of Government, and been called upon, as the deposite banks were, to repay thirty-seven millions of dollars in nine months, the shock to trade would have been more violent, and the suspension of specie payments would have occurred at an earlier period. The operations of any great institution, whether State or National, with extensive branches, and dealing largely in exchange, must convulse the trade of every country where it exists under the authority of Government, and the currency consists chiefly of bank notes. Its alarms and its efforts will be in proportion to the extent of its responsibilities; and in every revulsion of trade, its operations will be watched with apprehension. The magnitude of its transactions gives it the character of a Government; and its expansions and contractions, like the fluctuating revenues of the public Treasury, violently move the whole trade of the country alternately forward and backward, leaving at every revulsion distressing scenes of poverty and bankruptcy. The trade of no country can ever be well regulated when constantly liable to be disturbed, either by the operations of Government, or of a great and extended bank, whether State or National. Wherever the heavy transactions of both are united, trade must be subject to frequent alarms and revulsions. If commercial credit did not depend on the public revenue, and no great bank, vainly attempting to regulate currency and exchanges, existed, two of the greatest causes of panics would be removed. These would not often occur if trade were left to its own resources, to the exclusive and undisturbed use of its own capital and credit, and if it enjoyed the liberty to create and manage its own banking agents, without requiring that they should be clothed with legislative privileges, or armed with the powers of Government. Revulsions might still occur, but they would be less frequent and violent, and we should at least never witness the extraordinary spectacle of a laboring population without employment, in a country enjoying unexampled prosperity.

Such an agency is not only injurious to trade, but unjust to other banking institutions. By collecting the public revenue, whether in specie or in bank notes, all other banks are directly or indirectly made tributary to the Treasury agents. Their specie is either drawn from them, or balances are created which compel them to draw upon their debtor banks, while the deposite banks are paying the public disbursements in their own notes. Such undue advantages should be given to no banks, especially when the system is otherwise so injurious to trade and to the Treasury.

The proposed separation is essential to the steady and independent action of trade, banks, and Government. The finances of the latter must become embarrassed at every revulsion, so long as our revenue consists of bank notes or bank deposites. The convertibility of either into specie is wholly illusive, and has been hitherto sustained by confidence alone. That confidence is now destroyed. If a few banks only had suspended specie payments from bad management, confidence in other institutions might have been continued. Or if, as in war, Government had deemed it expedient to borrow their credit and sanction its abuse, it might have revived with the return of peace, and the restoration of specie payments. But it never has occurred before, that, in time of peace and amidst general prosperity, the banks of a nation have simultaneously suspended specie payments; and, what is far more important, as it regards the future, the wishes of the trading community anticipated the action of the banks, the suspension was hailed as a measure of commercial relief, our Legislatures sanctioned it, and the public were compelled to acquiesce. The effects of the suspension were little understood by those who deemed it a measure of relief. The trade of no country can be relieved by a sudden reduction of its currency. We had been for twelve months under the harsh operation of a diminution of commercial and bank credits. They had nearly, if not quite, reached that minimum from which, after a temporary stagnation of trade, they would naturally have risen again when the suspension, (for all commercial purposes at home,) suddenly converted eighty millions of currency into merchandize, and it was withdrawn from circulation. The compound standard of specie and paper, by which the property of the Union had been measured, was abruptly reduced from about one hundred and ninety millions to one hundred and ten millions of a variously depreciated currency; or, if we consider specie as the only common standard, from a hundred and ninety to eighty millions. Foreign exchanges rose, notwithstanding this extraordinary reduction, and all the sanguine anticipations of a revival of confidence and credit were disappointed. Our reduced currency was still further diminished, the term of our commercial embarrassments was prolonged, and the revival of trade postponed to an uncertain period. These were the consequences of that measure which it was supposed would relieve the country.

But, however we may suffer by the recent suspension, we must anticipate a similar event at every revulsion. It cannot be avoided in this age of speculation, and with our system of banking. In periods of alarm, those who are threatened with bankruptcy will seek relief in any measure, regardless of consequences. The banks will certainly yield to the demands of trade in some parts of the Union, and the recollections of the run upon them in 1837 will produce a panic which must compel most, if not all, other banks to follow their example. Some portions of the Union may possibly escape; but we may certainly anticipate embarrassment in some sections, and we should accordingly prepare for it. The banking system of this country must be thoroughly reformed before confidence in the convertibility of bank notes can be permanently revived. No such reform can, at this time, be anticipated. A few more disastrous revulsions may compel us, at some future period, to correct the vices of our system; but, for the present, it is evident that our local currencies are to be still further vitiated by State legislation. With our recent experience, and with such a prospect before us, a just and patriotic regard for the public interest urgently requires that the Treasury of the United States should not be hereafter exposed to embarrassment or bankruptcy by being connected with a system liable at all times to explosion, and that it should never again be made dependant upon every vicissitude in the commercial system of the world.

The Federal Government is also bound to preserve for the States the only measure of value recognised by the Constitution, that the taxes and disbursements of our Confederacy may be collected and paid out in a common medium. If the proposed measure be rejected, we cannot hereafter anticipate any uniformity in our taxes, or any such thing as a federal currency. With our complicated banking system, the immense enlargement of commercial credit, the rapid growth of the commerce of the Southwestern States, and of the settlement of the new States generally, we cannot preserve equality in exchanges or local currencies. Our exchanges were as much deranged in 1825, while we had a National Bank, as they were in 1837; and our paper system would have exploded then, had not that revulsion originated in Great Britain. The history of our cotton trade exhibits fluctuations which defy control. The price periodically gives way; the Southwestern States are deprived of a large amount of their funds for remittance, and our exports are suddenly suspended. Such vicissitudes must continue with the rapid growth of the culture and manufacture of cotton, and with the enlargement of the paper systems of Great Britain and the United States. It is obvious that the power and the mischiefs of our banking system are about to become still more formidable, and there is too much reason to apprehend, in a few years, an explosion more distrous to all branches of industry than any we have hitherto felt. While the States continue to multiply banks authorized to supply the country with a currency, no effort of the Federal Government, whether by incorporating a National Bank, or by a perpetual issue of Treasury notes, could prevent a suspension of specie payments, while either of these measures would but increase speculation and the violence of revulsion. The only alternative left for the Government is to guard permanently against the effect of such legislation, and of such explosions upon the common medium of our Confederacy. Should we ever restore the agency of banks, or permanently invest our revenue in bank notes, we shall be compelled at every suspension to issue Treasury notes as a substitute for coin, or to collect our revenues, and make our disbursements, in the variously depreciated bank paper of the States, contrary to every rule of justice, and to the express provisions of the Constitution. Should such ever become our policy, it would end in the entire destruction of the only uniform, permanent, and universal measure of value, and of the only wholesome regulator of the trade and credit of the world. If, on the contrary, we wisely separate our Treasury from the credit of our banks, we shall secure, through all the vicissitudes of trade, and the fluctuations of our local currencies, a common medium for our taxes and disbursements, a uniform measure of value for the States, and a standard which would tend to adjust more speedily, after every revulsion, the temporary derangements in our exchanges and currencies.

The public mind is satisfied that some plan should be adopted to relieve trade from any connection with our revenues, and to render our Treasury independent of all explosions. Numerous plans have been proposed for making a partial use of banks, for the mere purpose of keeping the public money, under some special deposite system, with an obligation not to employ it in loans to trade. No such deposite can be effectual but one which secures to the Treasury the control over the money specially deposited, and leaves the daily receipts and payments to be made by public officers. Such a system would merely secure the use of the vaults of the banks as places of safety, and would be unnecessary where our public offices are supplied, as they all must be, with vaults or safes, or both, for the preservation of the public archives and treasure. If the banks have control over the public money deposited with them, all the stipulations and obligations which can be contrived will never prevent them from discounting upon it, directly or indirectly; and all the guards we can provide will not secure to the Treasury its specie fund in case of a suspension. The various regulations which have been proposed would be, in practice, mere nullities. The obligation to credit the revenue collected, as specie, has always existed, and would be and more binding hereafter than it has been heretofore; and a special deposite, exclusively controlled by the bank, would be as unavailable in case of a suspension as any other, which it would be equally bound in law to pay in specie. A stipulation that the bank shall pay the Treasury warrant in specie would be abortive, as that must be determined by the Government creditor. Whether the deposites are in specie or in bank notes, it will pay out its own notes, and increase its discounts accordingly. Periodical settlements with banks having control over the deposites, before and after the settlement, would be a mere formality. Banks might be employed under a system of joint management and control. Special collections, deposites, and disbursements might be made under the care of two sets of officers, one to be appointed by Government, the other by the banks; but such a plan would require a much greater number of officers than is now proposed; and would, at the same time, enable the banks employed by the Treasury to substitute their notes for the coin collected, and enlarge their issues and their discounts, which is one of the principal evils designed to be avoided by the separation.

The Treasury cannot, with safety to itself or to trade, part with its control over the public money, from its collection to its disbursement. After examining the subject in all its bearings, and with every desire to unite public sentiment in some measure, the committee are more than ever convinced that the simplest, most economical, and best plan, for all interests, as a permanent system, is to employ officers of Government, appointed by the President with the approbation of the Senate, to collect, keep, and disburse the public money, under such regulations, guards, and restrictions as Congress may from time to time deem expedient. Various objections have been made to this plan which deserve consideration. Some apprehend that, if not now, it will ultimately require a large addition to the number of officers in the public service, and so far increase Executive patronage. This apprehension seems founded on a mistaken idea of the duties of our public officers, as they have existed from the commencement of the Government. All the essential duties of receiving, keeping, and disbursing the public money have always been, and are now, performed by them, and the proposed measure might be carried into effect without the addition of a single officer, but for the special depositories proposed for greater security. The money for cash duties and public lands has always been collected by our own officers, and placed in banks, in the first instance, to their own credit, or kept in their own hands. Prior to 1800 all the custom-house bonds were collected at our custom-houses, and some are still so. But even when collected by banks, which was a mere Treasury regulation, the amount was carried to the credit of the collectors, and not to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. Our receivers and collectors have always had, whether banks were employed or not, the absolute control, for a time, of the whole of our revenue from customs and public lands, amounting, since 1789, to more than $1,053,000,000. The only change now proposed is, that our officers shall not hereafter transfer the money to banks to be loaned out, but that they shall keep it and pay it over directly to the order of the Treasury. It will certainly be more convenient to pay it at their own offices than to transfer it, as heretofore, to deposite banks. The same officers will continue to be employed in discharging the same duties generally throughout the Union, without any addition to their number. At seven points of collection the duties and responsibilities will be increased by the bill proposed, and in these cases alone can any further aid be required.

For the greater security of the public revenue, it is proposed to establish seven special depositories. Having a Treasurer of the United States at the seat of Government, it is obviously more proper that the public money collected within this District and its neighborhood should be placed in his custody for public use, than that it should be, as heretofore, deposited in banks to be employed in loans. It is proposed that this officer shall take charge of and pay over, for public purposes only, all money which may be collected within this District, or which may otherwise come into his hands.

As we have mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, with every provision for the security of the public money, it is proposed that the cash collections at the custom-houses in these places should be transferred daily, and the bonds for duties weekly, to these depositories. The duties of receiving, keeping and paying over the public money, are not new to the treasurers of the mints. The Treasury is authorized to employ a million of dollars in facilitating the coinage which is constantly passing through their hands. They also perform the same duties for banks and merchants. The duties of the treasurers will not be changed in character, but their receipts and payments for Government will be moderately increased in amount.

We have now officers employed in our custom-houses to collect the cash duties. The officer at New York received at that custom-house, in 1836, five millions of dollars. As there are to be special depositories at Boston, New York, and Charleston, with increased responsibilities, it is proposed to substitute, in their places, at these ports, officers of a higher grade, to be denominated "public receivers;" and as a similar depository is proposed at St. Louis, an officer of the same grade, in lieu of the receiver now there. These officers and the treasurers of the mints will also have charge of sums as may be transferred from other points. The increased labor and responsibility imposed on the Treasurer of the United States, the treasurers of the mints, and the public receivers, may require further aid; the Secretary of the Treasury is therefore authorized to appoint two additional clerks for Washington, two for New York, and one for each of the other four depositories, making altogether nine clerks. No other increase of officers will be required to carry the proposed measure into full effect. This small addition is all that is proposed or required to execute a measure designed extensively to diminish Executive patronage, by dispensing entirely with the agency of banks, and by separating that branch of our Government from all control and influence over a powerful association of corporations, with thousands of directors, officers, and stockholders. If an important measure is to be rejected, because nine clerks are to be added to the number now in the public service, we should, with equal reason, stop the progress of legislation, for scarcely a session passes in which Congress is not compelled to authorize the employment of a greater number of officers to carry into effect the various laws required in the administration of the affairs of our rapidly growing country.

The same mistake as to the responsibilities of our own officers, has produced an erroneous impression that we are now, for the first time, about to place the public money in their custody. Defalcations are consequently apprehended; and to avoid these, a special deposite of the public money in banks for safe-keeping is advocated by some, who are decidedly favorable to the separation. From 1789 to the present time, the public money, in its collection, has been all placed under the control of our own officers: most of it was afterwards placed in banks, or transferred to the credit of the Treasurer on their books; and finally, it was confided to disbursing officers. We have had, generally, very inadequate security; and, in many instances, especially as it regards disbursing officers, not even the ordinary security of bonds. Under such loose regulations, the wonder is that our losses were not greater, considering the immense amount which has passed through the hands of our officers. Our collectors have had under their control a gross revenue of 946,000,000 dollars, and our land receivers 107,000,000 dollars, making 1,053,000,000 dollars. They not only had the control of this vast amount, but they were permitted to pay, without a warrant from the Treasury, and before the money passed out of their hands, all the expenses of our custom-houses and land offices, and debentures, which alone amounted to four or five millions annually, and sometimes more. Notwithstanding these temptations to commit fraud, and to employ the public money for private use, the whole amount of nominal and actual balances against all the collectors of the customs and the receivers of public lands throughout the Union, for forty-nine years, is about two millions and a half, being less than one-quarter of one per cent. on the amount received by them since 1789. But the larger proportion even of the balances now standing on the Treasury books, arises from the death of some, and the negligence of other public officers in not transmitting their vouchers, or from mere irregularity or informality. The collectors are charged with all the bonds, whether they are paid or not, and the receivers with the lands sold, whether they have received the money or not. Sometimes the vouchers are lost or destroyed, and many applications have been, from time to time, made to Congress, to enable the Treasury to settle the accounts of officers, who, though not indebted to Government, have been for years, and are still, reported as defaulters. From the best estimates that can be made at the Treasury, not more than one million of these balances is actually due to Government from our collectors and receivers of public money, leaving a probable loss of about one tenth of one per cent. of the amount under their charge and control. We have lost nothing by the disbursing officers of the army proper for twenty years past, and, as to other disbursing officers, we have generally neglected to require security of them.

These losses by public officers cannot, however, be urged as an argument in favor of employing banks, as they have, with little exception, all occurred while the latter were the agents of the Treasury. We have, moreover, at the same time, lost more in proportion by banks than by our own officers. Throwing aside the millions lost by their depreciated paper, and commencing with the Bank of the United States in 1817, and after the resumption of specie payments, our losses amounted, in seventeen years, by bank depositories, to $1,075,954, and by bank notes $178,470, making $1,254,424, of which there is no prospect of our ever recovering any part. Assuming that, from 1817 to 1834, our deposites in all the banks amounted to $350,000,000, the actual loss in seventeen years would be nearly three-eighths of one per cent. while the probable loss by all our collectors and receivers in forty-nine years cannot be estimated at more than about one-tenth of one per cent. We have besides, by the recent revulsion, a suspended debt due from the deposite banks of $5,925,800, and $4,000,000 more to the credit of our disbursing officers. What part of this we may lose cannot now be estimated. We shall be fortunate if we have not occasion hereafter to double the amount of the losses before referred to. But we have at least ascertained that, in seventeen years of peace and general prosperity, and during the existence of a National Bank, we have lost more by this connection with banks than the amount of all our losses by collectors and receivers in forty-nine years, though the former were entrusted with about $350,000,000 only, and the latter with $1,053,000,000.

While we are thus exposed to heavy losses by employing banks, the renewal of this agency would not, in the slightest degree, diminish our chance of loss by public officers. The employment of banks cannot remove the necessity of confiding to our own officers in collecting and disbursing the public money, unless we abolish our custom-houses, land offices, and disbursing agencies, and assign all the duties of Government to banks. Under no practicable system can we avoid trusting our own officers with the public money, as we have done from the origin of our Government. Fortunately, our experience of their fidelity does not warrant the withdrawal of our confidence. In collecting more than a thousand millions, our probable loss does not exceed the tenth part of one per cent. and at the principal point of collection it is far less. At the port of New York there have been in collecting the customs, since 1789, but two defalcations, one of which is still unadjusted and before Congress; but if the whole amount should be found due, the security is ample. The other, amounting to $21,700, is the entire loss at that port in collecting $357,000,000, or about six cents on every thousand dollars, being about one sixtieth part of the loss by banks, from 1817 to 1834, on $350,000,000 deposited. The operations of our mint also afford ample evidence of the confidence which we may repose in our own officers. No defalcation in the offices of that establishment is known to the Treasury, though about seventy-three millions of dollars have been coined. We thus see our banks and merchants placing millions in the custody of the very officers who, we are told, are unworthy of the confidence of the Government from which they receive their appointments.

Under the additional guards now proposed, our losses, by public officers, will be diminished, and by separating our Treasury from banks, we shall avoid that class of losses altogether. Ample bonds are hereafter to be required from all who are entrusted with public money. Collectors and receivers are not to be allowed to pay out money for any purpose, without an order from the Treasury. All money collected is to be placed at once to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. For greater security, transfers may be made from one depository to another; and where there is no special depository, deposites may be made with banks under the joint control of the bank and the Treasury. To guard against frauds, it is made the duty of certain public officers in the different districts to examine the money and accounts of those who are entrusted with the public money, and the Secretary may, at any time, appoint other officers within the districts to make special examinations and returns. And, finally, should any officer use or embezzle the money entrusted to him, he shall be convicted of felony, fined, and imprisoned. Most of our custom-houses and land offices are already furnished with vaults or safes, or both, for the preservation of the public archives and public money; but, to provide for every such contingency, an appropriation of ten thousand dollars is proposed, which is the only new appropriation authorized by the bill. With all these additional guards for the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue, the losses of Government, under the proposed plan, will be much less than under any other hitherto adopted, independent of our losses by banks and their paper.

The objection which deserves most consideration is, that a large surplus might accumulate in the Treasury, and operate injuriously upon the banks, if it consisted entirely of specie. To obviate this, the Secretary of the Treasury recommends that any surplus above four millions of dollars should be invested in stocks, to be sold whenever the Treasury should want the money. Aware of the importance of providing against an unnecessary surplus, the committee have duly considered this proposition, but feel constrained to reject it. The main object of the plan now proposed is to confine the Treasury exclusively to the collection, transfer, and disbursement of the public money by the most simple, economical, and safe means. It is not designed that the Treasury should either be a financier or a banker, further than may be absolutely necessary in the collection and disbursement of our revenue. To connect it either with stocks or banks would be incompatible with this design. The occasional investment of our surplus might also produce other evils. Our dealings in stock would be anticipated by those engaged in that trade, and speculations would be founded on the fluctuations of our Treasury. Congress too would neglect one of its first duties, which is to reduce our taxes whenever the revenue exceeds the wants of Government. A permanent law, graduating our income to our expenditure, may be hereafter adopted, when all our duties are levied ad valorem, as is proposed by the act of March, 1833, to take effect in 1842. But, for the present, no investment, or any other measure is necessary, as we have no reason whatever to apprehend a surplus. The twenty-seven millions deposited with the States is wholly unavailable, the debt of the United States Bank is payable in three annual instalments, and the six millions of suspended balances due from the deposite banks will not be paid for some time to come. Our revenue, both from customs and lands, is very much reduced, while our military expenditures are unavoidably increasing, and further and extraordinary appropriations must be made for the present year, and may be required in 1839. The Treasury notes which were authorized to be issued at the late session are receivable for public dues, and cannot be re-issued. This makes a charge of some millions on the revenue of the present year equal to the amount of the notes received at our custom-houses and land offices. It is obvious that, far from being a surplus, there will be a deficiency, which must be supplied either by a re-issue of the Treasury notes redeemed, or by an authority to issue others. There is not the least probability that our revenue, for two years to come, will be equal to the wants of Government; and if, for the next four years, it should be sufficient to meet our expenditures, and to redeem the Treasury notes which have been, or may be hereafter, issued, it will be full as much as can be reasonably anticipated. In the mean time, our tariff is in a process of reduction, and after June, 1842, the highest rate will be twenty per cent. ad valorem, payable in cash. When it is considered that one-half of our importations are free of duty, it is obvious that, so far from anticipating a surplus of revenue from this source, Government will be compelled to rely, more than it has done hitherto, on its income from public lands for its support. The proposed warehousing system would also tend to keep the revenue down, as merchandise would only be entered as it might be required for consumption. The Treasury notes required for the service of 1838 and 1839, will only be issued to discharge claims, or, as the money may be wanted, and any surplus which may accrue in 1840 and 1841, will be immediately applied to their redemption. In 1842 the ad valorem tariff takes effect, and the balance in the Treasury will be easily regulated by Congress. No surplus can, therefore, be anticipated; nor is there the slightest foundation for the fear that the banks can be, in any manner, affected by an accumulation of revenue in the Treasury, whether it consists of specie or Treasury notes. Such apprehensions, for two years to come, we know to be unfounded; for our current expenses and existing obligations will require all our resources; the revenue must be paid out as fast as it is collected, and the balance in the Treasury must remain at its minimum. And there is no prospect, whatever, for four years at least, of a surplus, whether collected in specie or otherwise, which can, in any manner, affect injuriously the trade, credit, or currency of the country. There is certainly, therefore, no satisfactory reason for providing, at this time, for the investment of a surplus which may accrue at some future period, not now to be anticipated.

From the actual condition of our finances, and the probable state of our receipts and expenditures for the future, it is obvious, that the question as to the medium in which our revenue shall be collected, must be, for some time to come, of very little importance, so far as it relates to its practical operation upon the banks or trade of the country. After the suspension, the Treasury was compelled to collect the revenue, according to law, in specie or in evidences of public debt, and until there is a resumption of specie payments, neither Congress nor the Treasury can, by any constitutional means, direct that it shall be otherwise collected. Some of the banks may resume at an early period; but while there is evidently so little concert of action or harmony of purpose among them, it would be unsafe to invest the public money in the notes of any bank; and when a general resumption will occur is not now to be anticipated. The rejection or adoption, therefore, of the measure proposed would not now alter the medium of our collections, and could not affect trade or banks. Its adoption, however, would be so far beneficial, as it would tranquillize the public mind; while its postponement or rejection would tend only to keep alive imaginary apprehensions. The revival of trade depends upon its own and ample resources. Its temporary prostration was produced by one of its periodical excesses. It is now in a condition to start again with renewed energy, and all that is wanting to give an impulse to the prosperity of the country, is the mutual and concerted action of our banking institutions—the most efficient agents of credit, when not ascoiated with the fortunes of party, or the operations of Government.

Practically, the existing law and that now proposed is the same; and as this section of the bill would be inoperative for some time, it might, on that ground, be dispensed with; but it is of great importance to the Government and the country that a permanent system should be adopted, and most especially at a time when, from the actual condition of our finances, its introduction cannot affect any interest. The present is the most proper time to devise means gradually to take from the banks the power to make the public revenue instrumental in increasing the embarrassments of the trading community. To use their notes as a medium for our receipts and expenditures, would as effectually defeat this important object, as if we were to continue to deposite the public money with the banks. Whether the Government keep their notes in the Treasury and use them for public purposes, or deposite its revenue in banks, is wholly immaterial; for their discounts would be equally extended, and the design of the separation equally defeated. The only practical difference between the deposite system and the measure proposed, (if we are still to keep and circulate bank notes,) is that we should, under the latter, be at the expense and trouble of keeping an amount of bank notes in the Treasury as a mere substitute for an equal amount of bank deposites which would exist under the former system, without any agency, risk, or expense whatsoever, the banks would be enabled to increase their dividends by discounting to the extent of the public circulations, and on the amount of their deposites in the Treasury of the United States. Under either system the Government would find its Treasury precisely in the same embarrassed condition that it was in May last. As to the mere formality whether the Government or its debtors shall draw the specie from the banks, such an arrangement might be made for the convenience of the latter without detriment to the Treasury. But the permanent deposites of the public money must consist of specie or evidences of public debt, and all our payments must be made in the same, otherwise the object of separating the Government from banks is entirely defeated.

When the banks resume specie payments this section will take effect, but as it merely proposes a prospective reduction for six years, the process will be so gradual as scarcely to be felt, especially in the present reduced state of our Treasury. At some future period when a surplus may accrue, the effect of specie collections will be most salutary in moderating the excessive issues of bank notes at those points where a paper currency is most exposed to explosion, and in checking an abuse of credit in its origin. The amount of specie which would be at any time required at all our land offices and custom-houses, would be insignificant in comparison with the aggregate of our metallic currency, which is now estimated at eighty millions. A surplus of four millions, distributed in our offices throughout the Union, would be the maximum, and one-half of even that amount would be at all times represented by Treasury warrants and drafts in circulation. No transfers would ever be made in specie from one point to another, (except a limited amount for paying some of the Indian tribes,) as transfer drafts would be much more economical, convenient, and safe.

Instead of hoarding all the specie, or introducing an exclusive metallic currency, the Government would, at no time, require for all its operations one-twentieth part of the specie in the country. The tendency of the measure would be to increase the aggregate amount; but whether it should or not, certainly so small a portion might be spared for the uses of Government, when it is for the great purposes of relieving trade from its embarrassing connection with the public money, and of protecting the Treasury from periodically having its funds invested in irredeemable bank notes of variously depreciated values.

The public interest urgently requires at the present session of Congress, some measure guarding more effectually the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue. The Treasury is embarrased for want of regulations adapted to the crisis, and losses may result from our neglect to provide for the security of the public money. Whether the measure be temporary or permanent, some such as that proposed ought to be adopted in the actual condition of our finances. Some time, perhaps years, must elapse, before even the opportunity will be offered, with any prospect of success, of reuniting our Treasury with banks generally, State or National. A National Bank is not now proposed, and whenever it is, as it no doubt will be, it must encounter an opposition not easily or readily overcome. The dangers of such an agent of Government to the political institutions of the country, are too well and generally understood, to warrant the expectation that we shall ever again adopt a remedy worse than the disease.

The proposition to renew the State bank deposite system, after so recent an explosion, and in the present condition of our banking institutions, is premature, if not extraordinary. It would seem to be time enough to discuss its expediency after a general resumption of specie payments; for, if now adopted, we should have in a few months a deposite bank system in the East and an Independent Treasury in the West. This new deposite bank plan has all the vices and insecurity of the one we have been compelled to abandon, with some additional provisions which render it far less acceptable. A league of twenty-five banks, controlled, as it would be inevitably, by some great institution at or near the centre of circulation and exchanges; with the power, in effect, to determine in what medium our revenue shall be collected, and authorized to discount upon the public deposites, would be essentially a National Bank, with four and twenty branches, governing every other bank, and controlling trade and currency. Confirming the selection of these banks by joint resolution of both Houses would lead to annual struggles for the patronage of Congress, and involve them still more deeply in the fluctuations of party. The demand proposed to be made weekly on other banks for specie would give special privileges to this league, and the authority thus delegated "to check over-issues, and to preserve the soundness of the currency" would confer on the Secretary of the Treasury and this league of banks the extraordinary power of regulating, at their discretion, the currency of the country. The further proposition to compel the Government to receive the notes of specie paying banks, was brought forward in the late Congress, and is again revived. Hitherto, Government has enjoyed, under the joint resolution of 1816, the right, in common with the community, of receiving them voluntarily, or demanding specie; but this right is hereafter to be sacrificed to encourage the circulation of bank notes, and to embarrass the Treasury at every revulsion. It would at least seem to be prudent to collect from the banks our six millions of suspended balances, before we inquire into the expediency of again placing the Treasury of the United States in jeopardy.

The measure recommended by the committee is the only one practicable, in the present condition of our banking institutions. It proposes nothing new, either in our laws or practice, which is not indispensable to the security of the public revenue. It is no innovation—no experiment. From the origin of our Government, our own officers have collected, kept, and disbursed the public money throughout the Union. The only change proposed is, that they shall hereafter pay it over directly to the order of the Treasury, and not, as heretofore, transfer it to banks, to be employed in commercial discounts. This use, or rather abuse, of the public money, was the great innovation of 1791, and originated with those friendly to a Bank of the United States. It was an experiment of our own for the benefit of that institution, and was not in accordance with the practice of other countries. We have felt its disastrous effects, and we are now generally satisfied that, once discontinued, it ought never to be renewed. The other proposition to collect our revenue in specie, or evidences of public debt, is an indispensable auxiliary to the first; for, without it, it is impossible to prevent the banks from discounting upon the amount of their credit in circulation and in deposite for public purposes. The measure is, moreover, irresistibly forced upon the Federal Government by State legislation, which, whether constitutional or not, defies its power to regulate both currencies by coinage. When we had but half the number of States, but few banks, and a sounder currency, we might tolerate the receipt of bank notes with safety; but with eight hundred banks, issuing every description of paper, six and twenty different systems of banking, and a rapid increase of our bank note circulations, this Government is compelled to confine its receipts and expenditures to the only medium which can be, hereafter, permanently common to the States. No improvement in our local currencies can be anticipated. The States are governed by opposite parties, contending for hostile principles of government, especially in relation to currency and banking. The reform which may be effected in some, is more than neutralized by the abuses sanctioned in other States, and only contributes to make the operations of our complicated system more irregular and more embarrassing to trade. Experience has not here, as in England, produced partial reform; for, in some of our oldest States, and where they have suffered most from broken banks, and the violence of revulsions, they still tolerate the most vicious systems of banking. Under such circumstances, if not from choice, the Federal Government is driven to the necessity of confining itself to a medium which is not regulated by State legislation, but by the unalterable law of the world.

Higher interests, however, than those of a character merely financial, are involved in the decision of this great question, whether the Treasury shall be permanently separated from banks, or whether we shall establish a perpetual union between the executive branch of our Government and the vast moneyed power of the country. While watching jealously, as we should, every increase of Executive patronage, and guarding, carefully, our Treasury from Executive control, we should watch with even more vigilance and apprehension the growth and movements of a power which, when combined with the organization of party, and permanently successful, must inevitably, not only control our finances, but govern the country. Without referring to earlier contests, the struggle of the last six years affords at least some evidence of an ambitious desire among those institutions which are contending for the use of the public money and public credit, to share in the administration of our national affairs. In this great struggle the interests of trade, and the welfare of the country, have been sacrificed by the too zealous efforts of the political portion of our bankers to perpetuate their control over the National Treasury, and to secure for ever to themselves and their successors the profits on the use of the public money and public credit. Such efforts, when combined with political views, might elevate to the Presidency a Chief Magistrate who would effect a formidable union between the Executive and the immense banking capital of the country, already amounting to more than three hundred millions of dollars. If we are now so much alarmed at the influence of the Executive, with our limited revenue, what may we not fear when that powerful branch of our Government is sustained, not only by the public Treasury, but by a thousand banks and thousands of other corporations, controlled and directed by a league of State institutions with large capitals, or by a national bank with a capital of fifty or one hundred millions of dollars.

Such are the consequences involved in the issue which is now dividing the nation, and agitating its trade and industry. It would almost seem that the honest efforts of some of our banks to produce harmony of action, and to resume specie payments, are defeated to prolong our embarrassments, and to convince the nation of the necessity of assigning the most important powers of Government to the stockholders of a National Bank. This contest should be ended by the prompt adoption of the measure proposed; for trade can never enjoy a steady prosperity till Government and banks are independent of each other. The public money should be applied to public purposes alone, and the banks should be free to pursue their own profitable course, without being embarrassed by the efforts of a small portion of their number employed as Treasury agents, or by perpetual struggles with the Executive or Congress. Should this contest ever result in the triumph of an alliance of the Executive and moneyed powers of the country, it cannot be expected that a union so fearful in its consequences, could be permanently successful. Patriotism would be justly alarmed for the fate of our political institutions, and for the existence of popular rights. Another and a more powerful struggle would commence, which would prove ruinous to trade, and might involve the legislative privileges of every bank and every corporation in the Union. By continuing this as an unsettled question, the trading and banking interests will be exposed to all the vicissitudes of party, and engaged in a perpetual war, unprofitable to themselves, and ruinous to the country. By adopting the measure proposed, and making it our permanent policy, every branch of trade will be left to move on undisturbed by our national political contests, and the Executive branch of our Government would be separated from a power which, when united with it, is the most dangerous to our free institutions and to our Confederacy.

The committee, therefore, respectfully submit the measure to the consideration of the House, sincerely hoping that, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the details of the bill, its essential principles may be adopted in some form; that this at least, among the many agitating questions, may be put to rest, that regulations so necessary to the safety of the public money may no longer be postponed; and that we may, by a thorough separation from banks, secure, at all times and under all circumstances, an Independent Treasury.

A BILL to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to take charge of all public money which may be collected within this District, and deposited with him by the collectors of the customs, or which may otherwise come into his hands, and to collect any other public money which may be payable to the United States in this District.

And it shall be the duty of the collectors of the customs at Philadelphia and New Orleans to continue to collect the cash duties and custom-house charges in their respective districts.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurers, and those acting as such, of the various Branch Mints already erected and now erecting, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs acting as collectors, all public receivers, all receivers of public money at the several land offices, and all postmasters, except as is hereinafter particularly provided, who may be entrusted with the public money, be, and they are hereby, required to keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper department or officer of the Government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the Government, which may be imposed by this or any other acts of Congress, or by any regulation of the Treasury Department, made in conformity to law; and also to do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the Executive Departments of the Government, as agents for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of those departments may be required by law to make, and which are of a character to be made by the depositaries hereby constituted, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon them.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at as early a day as possible after the passage of this act, to require from the several depositaries hereby constituted, and whose official bonds are not herein before provided for, to execute new bonds, suitable in their terms to meet the additional duties and responsibilities imposed upon them respectively by this act, and with sureties, and in sums such as shall seem reasonable and safe to the Secretary of the Treasury, and from time to time to require such bonds to be renewed and increased in amount and strengthened by new sureties, to meet any increasing responsibility which may grow out of accumulations of money in the hands of the depositary, or out of any other duty or responsibility arising under this or any other act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the collectors and receivers of public money of every description within the District of Columbia shall pay over to the Treasurer of the United States weekly, or oftener, as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct; and that the collectors of the customs and receivers of public money in Philadelphia and New Orleans shall pay over to the Treasurers of the Mints in their respective cities, daily, all the public money collected or received by them.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the money in the hands of any depositary constituted by this act to any other depositary authorized by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public money and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require; and for the purpose of payments on public account to draw upon any of the said depositaries as he may think most conducive to the public interest or to the public creditors, or both.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the money in the custody of any of the depositaries constituted by this act, shall be considered and held as deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be, at all times, subject to his draft, whether made for transfer or disbursement; and each depositary shall make returns to the Treasury Department of all money received and paid by him, at such times, and in such form, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That whenever public money shall accumulate in the hands of any depositary constituted by this act, other than the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, and the public receivers, to an amount beyond that secured by the bond of the officer, or which the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for any cause, consider unsafe, and it shall not be desirable to transfer the money so accumulated to any other depositary, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to direct the said money, or any portion thereof, to be specially deposited in such bank of the State, or Territory, wherein the depositary who is to make the deposite is located, as he, the said Secretary, shall select: Provided, The bank so selected will agree to receive and keep the money deposited with it upon the terms and conditions prescribed in the next section of this act.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the special deposites of the public money authorized by the last preceding section of this act to be made in banks, shall be made upon the following terms and conditions:

First. All such deposites shall be strictly special deposites; and the banks holding them shall be prohibited, in the most effectual manner, from making any use of the moneys deposited, by way of loans, discounts, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whatsoever; and to secure the fulfilment of this condition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to furnish the banks selected as deposite banks with safes for the keeping of the public moneys exclusively, and under the joint control of the bank and some officer of the Government to whom this duty may be assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, or to adopt such other guards as he shall prefer.

Second. Nothing but gold or silver, or such Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed by law to be received in payment of the public dues, shall be offered for deposite, or received by the bank as a deposite, under the provisions of this act.

Third. All deposites shall be passed, upon the books of the bank, to the credit of the depositary making the same; but no money deposited in pursuance of this act shall be withdrawn without the express order of the Secretary of the Treasury; and no drafts of the Treasurer of the United States, or orders or warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury for ordinary transfer or disbursement, shall be made upon any bank selected as a deposite bank under this act.

Fourth. A commission, such as shall be agreed upon between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank, not in any case to exceed one-eighth of one per centum upon the money deposited with it, shall be allowed and paid by the United States, in full satisfaction of all claims on the part of the bank for trouble and risk growing out of the receipt, safe keeping, and return of the special deposites herein authorized to be made, and all accounts for commissions shall be audited and paid at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That, in case no bank within the State or Territory wherein the depositary, directed to make deposites, is located, will consent to receive the moneys of the Government upon special deposite, according to the foregoing conditions and regulations, then it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the same to the office of the Treasurer of the United States, to the Mint, or Branch Mints, or to the offices of either of the public receivers, as shall be most convenient to the depositary, or for the disbursement of the public money.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause examinations to be made of the books, accounts, and money on hand, of each of the depositaries constituted by this act; and to direct the district attorney or marshal residing within the district to make said examinations; and in all cases where the sum on hand usually exceeds three-fourths of the amount of the officer's bond, said examinations shall not be made less frequently than once in each year, and as much more frequently, in those and all other cases, as the Secretary or either House of Congress shall direct. The agents directed to make these examinations shall be instructed to examine as well the books, accounts, and returns of the officer, as the money on hand, and the manner of its being kept, to the end that uniformity and accuracy in the accounts, as well as safety of the public money, may be secured thereby.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the examinations provided for in the last preceding section, and as a further guard over the public moneys, it shall be the duty of each collector, naval officer, and surveyor, as a check upon the public receiver at Boston, New York, and Charleston of their respective districts; of each naval officer and surveyor as a check upon the collectors of the customs, of their respective districts where he is entrusted with the public money; of each register of a land office, as a check upon the receiver of his land office or the public receiver; and of the director and superintendent of each mint and branch mint when separate offices, as a check upon the treasurers, respectively, of the said mints, or the persons acting as such, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, of the public receivers, collectors, receivers of land offices, treasurers, and persons acting as such, and to make a full, accurate, and faithful return to the Treasury Department of their condition.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, as soon as the convenience of the public business, and the safety of the public funds will permit, withdraw the balances remaining with the present depositaries of the public money, and confine the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the same to the depositaries established by this act.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That all officers charged by this act with the safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money, are hereby required to keep an accurate entry of each sum received, and of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made; and that if any one of the said officers shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public money intrusted to him for safe keeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said money as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a felony, and any officer or person convicted thereof, before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than two nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled.

Mr. SERGEANT said he deemed it proper to state that, on agreeing to this report, there was a division in the Committee of Ways and Means, and the minority would probably present their views in a counter report; but this had been read so recently, that there had not been sufficient time as yet to prepare a response to it. Mr. MASON of Ohio then moved to strike out the words "and no longer," and insert the words "and until the end of the then next session of Congress;" which amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to.

The third and last amendment was then taken up, the object of which was to prevent the trade of arms by land between this and conterminous countries; and, after a few words by Messrs. PATTON and CUSHING, the amendment was disagreed to.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government, for the year 1838."

The several clauses having been gone through, and some additional items agreed to, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

Mr. C. moved an additional clause of $4,694,000 for the service of the Post Office Department for the year 1838.

Mr. BELL objected to this amendment, on the ground of its not being sufficiently specific. He contended that the appropriations for this Department ought to be as specific as appropriations for any of the other Departments.

Mr. ADAMS concurred with the gentleman from Tennessee. He was surprised to see such an amendment as this introduced to an appropriation bill. You might as well make an appropriation of $4,694,000 for the expenses of the Post Office Department, as to introduce such specifications as those contained in the amendment of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. You might as well make this whole bill consist of but two lines, making an appropriation of twenty or thirty millions of dollars for the public service, as to introduce such an amendment as this.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the opinions expressed by the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Tennessee were precisely the opinions of the Committee of Ways and Means; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts had had his accustomed memory on this occasion, he would have recollected that this very appropriation, in its present form, was voted for at the last session by himself. The Post Office Department had remained unregulated for forty years by Congress, and it was not until last year that it was required that the moneys arising from postages had been placed in the Treasury, and in consequence of this it became necessary that this appropriation should be made, so that the Postmaster General shall be enabled to carry on the business of that office. Mr. C. concluded by moving an amendment to the amendment of the committee making the appropriation specific.

Mr. CONNOR replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, showing the great difficulty of making specifications with regard to the appropriations for the service of the department, like those of the other departments of the Government, going into particulars to illustrate his views.

Mr. ADAMS briefly replied to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) expressing himself as satisfied with the amendment last offered by the gentleman for the present; but he hoped, that hereafter this appropriation might be made still more specific.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana was happy that the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, had drawn the amendment pending from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He thought if there was any appropriation which should be specific, this appropriation ought to be, because, in his opinion, the Postmaster General had too extensive powers vested in him. Mr. G. addressed the House at some length, referring to the course of that department in a variety of cases.

Mr. MONTGOMERY stated that the estimates for this branch of the public service had been made as specific as it was possible to make them, considering the nature of that service, where changes were constantly taking place in the mode of carrying the mail, in putting on new routes, &c. Mr. M. then enumerated the items as follows:

Transportation of the mails	$3,400,000
Compensation of postmasters	935,000
Ship, steamboat, and way letters	31,000
Wrapping paper	20,000
Office furniture	6,000
Advertising	25,000
Mail bags	40,000
Blanks	36,000
Mail locks and keys and stamps	9,000
Mail depredations and special agents	12,000
Clerks for offices	140,000
Miscellaneous	40,000
	$4,694,000

In reference to the present head of that Department, Mr. M. said it would be impossible to find any man, of any party, who could conduct the affairs of that laborious and important office with more diligence, fidelity, or ability, than did the present Postmaster General.

Mr. McKAY referred to the Postmaster General's report, showing that therein every item of estimate was specifically set forth.

Mr. REED complained of the large amount paid to newspapers for advertising, and of the omnipotence of the Postmaster General in advertising in what papers he thinks fit, and of paying therefor what he pleases. Some country papers, he said, received as much for advertising, as half the value of the papers themselves. He wished this matter regulated, and to have some report on the subject; and he asked the chairman of the Post Office committee for information on these topics.

Mr. MONTGOMERY presumed the gentleman could get all the information he desired by a call on the department.

Mr. REED said he had made repeated calls, publicly and privately, without effect.

Mr. MONTGOMERY replied, that a response to the gentleman's call would have been made earlier, but for the illness of the Postmaster General, and that a general answer would be given to all the calls upon him, as soon as practicable, including several made by the committee of which Mr. M. was chairman.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the clause as amended was also agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an additional item for reprinting the annual accounts of the expenditures, &c. $9,000, and put in a letter from Mr. Smith, the Register, and an estimate from Mr. Nourse, from which it appeared that only one copy of that valuable and important document now existed.

After a few words from Messrs. CAMBRELENG and ADAMS, it was disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an item of $2000 for repairing the Marine Hospital at Charleston; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an additional section, authorizing the same compensation to be given to the custom-house officers for 1838, according to the importations of their respective ports, as they would have received if the Compromise act had not passed, limiting its operation to the passage of a bill now before the House.

After a few words from Messrs. CAMBRELENG, REED, BELL, CUSHMAN, and PHILLIPS, as to whether the bill regulating the pay and duties of custom-house officers would pass, Mr. CAMBRELENG believing it would not, the other gentlemen expressing a hope and a belief that it would,

On motion of Mr. REED,

The committee rose and reported, without taking the question.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The amendments were all ordered to be printed; and then,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 6, 1838.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of the Milwaukee and Rock river canal company, and remarked that previous to his moving its, a reference to the appropriate committee, as the petition was of considerable importance to the public, and the petitioners, he begged leave to give a short statement of its contents.

The petitioners say that the Legislative Assembly of Wisconsin Territory have incorporated a company for the purpose of constructing a canal from Lake Michigan, at Milwaukie, to Rock river, whereby a navigable communication will be effected between the lakes and the Mississippi. The charter empowers the Company to ask of the General Government, on behalf of the Territory, such aid as may be deemed proper and expedient, and provides that whatever aid shall be so granted, may accrue to the benefit of the State after its organization. It also provides that the said State, at any time after its organization, without any other limitation of time than its own pleasure, may take possession of the works constructed by the company, including the canal and all its appendent privileges, by refunding the amount, and interest, by them expended in such construction, aside from any appropriation which may be made by the Government; thus securing to the State all the benefits arising from such appropriation, as effectually as if made to the State after its organization.

The memorial now presented, comes from the company thus incorporated, and asks for an appropriation in lands similar to the grants made to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to aid in their respective works which pass through the public lands, to be placed at the disposal of the Territorial Legislature, and the proceeds to be applied to the construction of the canal.

The memorialists further say that the canal line from Milwaukie to Rock river, lies entirely within lands owned by the Government, with the exception of from two to three miles at the eastern termination at Milwaukie; and should Congress consider this work of sufficient importance and public utility to justify such a grant in its aid as is solicited, it will be apparent that, in order to secure the full benefit of the grant, both as regards the Government in the sale of the alternate sections, and as regards the Territory in the value of the grant, and the execution of the work, it should be made before a sale of the public lands through which it passes shall take place.

The memorial presents a brief view and description of the country, and of the objects of general interest to be promoted by the proposed work. The memorialists may be regarded in the light of an agency of the future State of Wisconsin, rather than a company possessing valuable and permanent privileges, which might secure to them the control of the transit commerce, and the manufacturing power created by, and connected with the canal. Their agency is of such a nature, as to promote the public interest by the early completion of the canal, and to cease whenever the political organization of the local Government will admit, and the public interest demand.

The memorialists say that it cannot be doubted but that the contemplated canal is a work of very high importance generally, as well as locally. It not only forms a connection between the Mississippi and the Lakes, at important points, but opens the lead mine region to a direct communication with the Lakes; thus giving additional value to that important branch of the domestic production of the country, by giving to it, not only a choice of market, but free access to all the markets of the country.

The memorialists further say, that the connection here can be effected in less time, and at less expense, than at either of the great points in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and by it, equally important objects effected. The length of the canal is 52 miles, the amount of lockage 380 feet; and the line in general is represented to be of the most favorable character. The estimated expense, by an experienced engineer, of well-established reputation, varies a fraction from $800,000.

The memorialists say, that considering the feasibility of the work, and the important objects to be attained by it; considering the state of the country, its rapid settlements, its valuable productions, and its want of facilities for internal trade and intercourse, a reasonable hope is indulged that Congress will give the subject that attention to which it is entitled by its merits, and their favorable action upon the memorial of the company, by granting said alternate sections of the public lands, as was granted to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. WHITE presented the petition of Hannah Smith, praying compensation for a horse lost during the Florida war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. W. likewise presented the petition of William Weedeman, which, upon his motion, was referred to the same committee.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose to present to the Senate a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, instructing her Senators, and requesting her Representatives, to use their best endeavors to procure the passage of a law providing that notes of all the State banks that may redeem their notes in specie, on demand, shall be received in payment for the public lands. Mr. S. said he was very happy to find that his colleague and himself were not mistaken in supposing, at the extra session, that such was the opinion of their State. He fully concurred with the Legislature on this particular point. He had already given his views at large on the whole subject, and he would not detain the Senate at this time further than to say that it would afford him great pleasure to act in obedience to the instructions, in aid of the object of the resolution. The resolution spoke of public lands alone. He went the whole. He would apply its principles to all Government dues, as embraced by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia to the Sub-Treasury bill, and he would, as he had before stated, go for that amendment as the only probable plan to carry into effect the principle, at present submitted, or likely to be submitted to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. S. the resolution was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of State to dispense with so much of the duties of that office as required the laws of Congress to be recorded in books prepared for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported bills for the relief of Capt. William Williams, accompanied by a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, for the relief of the heirs of Lieut. John Cropper, accompanied by a report; which was also ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which has been referred the bill to prevent duelling in the District of Columbia, reported the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. C. moved to make the bill the special order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama objected that it should be made the special order on that day. There were other matters of importance which he thought should claim precedence. He felt no disposition to give the bill the go-by, but was averse to yielding it a preference over matters in which his constituents were interested.

Mr. CLAYTON replied, that he had been instructed by the committee to make it the order of the day for Monday next. There were other subjects which had been made the special order of the day for that time, and he presumed no difficulty would grow out of it, as the subjects having precedence would of necessity be taken up.

Mr. KING was also of opinion that no difficulty or delay to other business would grow out of making it the special order.

The bill was then made the special order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to create a new land district in the State of Mississippi; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the citizens of Missouri, in relation to an academy of science in St. Louis; which was concurred in.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joseph Fletcher, and that he have leave to withdraw his papers.

Also, to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Elias Davis, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, from the further consideration of the petition of William Eaton.

Which were severally concurred in.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General be instructed to communicate to the Senate any correspondence between their respective departments and the Metropolis bank in this city, and any facts in their possession, touching the conduct of said bank as a depository and fiscal agent, and particularly in relation to the conduct of said bank, if such has been the fact, in attempting to retain public moneys deposited with it in satisfaction of pretended claims, which had not been approved and allowed by any competent authority.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that it take the usual course, and lie over one day, to which Mr. NILES assented.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquere into the expediency of making and appropriation for the erection of a light-house at the southwest pass of the Mississippi river.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of Peter Bargy and for other purposes;

A bill creating an additional land office in Michigan.

The Senate then resumed in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish a Surveyor General's Office in Illinois.

Mr. PRENTISS moved to strike out the salary of $2,000, as created by the bill, and insert $1,200. On this motion some debate insued, in which Messrs. WALKER, YOUNG, ROBINSON, and CLAY of Alabama, severally advocated the sum originally proposed. On this question the yeas and nays were demanded; when there appeared for the motion 20, against it 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Webster, and White—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lion, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Wright and Young—18.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he thought it better that the bill be laid on the table for the present, and made a motion to that effect.

On this motion, Mr. WALKER asked for the ayes and noes, when there appeared, for the motion 29, against it 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Troiter, Walker, Wall, and Young—15.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Independent Treasury bill was then taken up, when

Mr. NORVELL rose and addressed the Senate for upwards of two hours in favor of the bill. When Mr. NORVELL concluded there were cries of "question!" "question!"

Mr. TALLMADGE said the Senate was not full enough at that time to take the question on so important a matter; he would therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT said as there were other gentlemen that intended to address the Senate in favor of the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia, he would not object to its being passed over informally for the present.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had been waiting for some time for a proper period to move (in obedience to the instructions from the Legislature of his State,) to postpone the bill until the next session of Congress. Mr. B. thought the present occasion would afford the best opportunity for doing so, though his colleague was of opinion that the time had arrived several days ago. Mr. B. said he should now move that the bill be postponed accordingly, on which motion he should ask the yeas and nays, with the understanding that the question be taken prior to the vote on the Substitute.

The bill was then informally passed over.

The bill from the House of Representatives giving the assent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of Virginia to amend the act incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, was twice read and referred.

Mr. WALKER then moved to take up the bill to create a surveyor general's office in Illinois.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky opposed the motion, intimating his intention, when prepared, to oppose the bill. There was, he said, a constant tending to an increase of Executive patronage in land offices, land surveyors, etc. which it was high time to check.

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and carried —ayes 20.

The bill to amend the judicial system of the United States was taken up and discussed at some length, and finally, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, laid on the table.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

The Neutrality bill was then taken up; when

Mr. BUCHANAN said that since the frontier Neutrality bill came into the Senate, with the disagreement of the House to its third amendment, he had had a conversation with all the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and they were of opinion that this amendment contained a principle of such importance that it ought to be insisted on. He would therefore move that the bill be taken up, and that the Senate do insist on the amendment, and ask a conference with the House.

This motion was agreed to.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business, and soon after adjourned,

---

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, March 7, 1838.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to present two memorials from certain citizens of Massachusetts on the subject of the late duel, with a view to refer them to the select committee raised on the subject.

Objection being made,

Mr. A. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, but the call was refused; and on dividing the House twice no quorum voted, when

Mr. PATTON renewed the call for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and were—yeas 86, nays 55.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CHAMBERS then rose, and said he had a promise to redeem by moving that the daily hour of meeting be 10 o'clock, a. m.

Mr. C. also moved a discharge from a similar communication from the Navy Department, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

A Message was received from the Senate, stating that that body insisted on their third amendment disagreed to by the House, and asked a committee of conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses.

Mr. HOWARD moved that the House insist on its disagreement, and appoint a committee of three on its part to meet the committee appointed on the part of the Senate; which was agreed to.

CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported a bill for the relief of the securities of H. H. B. Hays, late postmaster at Claiborne, Alabama.

COMMERCE.

Mr. CURTIS reported a resolution directing, in addition to the one thousand extra copies already ordered, 3,000 additional copies of the chart and report of Cape Cod and Provincetown harbors, 200 of which are to be deposited at the Navy Department for its use, and 200 in the library of Congress for safe-keeping, which was considered and agreed to.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. CORWIN reported Senate bill, with amendments, to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the seventh circuit; which was ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read a third time and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. HARLAN reported a bill to extend the time for selling the lands granted to the Deaf and Dumb Assylum of Kentucky, [to two years further,] which was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time and passed.

Mr. CHEATHAM reported a bill for the relief of Paul Poissot. Also, a bill for the relief of J. Eloi Rachal.

Mr. LEADBETTER reported a bill for the relief of Henry Stoker, William G. Belknap, and Benjamin Walker.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr RANDOLPH reported a bill in addition to the act to promote the progress of the useful arts, and for other purposes, approved July 4, 1836.

On motion of Mr. R. 5,000 extra copies of the report and documents accompanying the bill were ordered to be printed.

PORT OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked leave to take up and consider the "bill to continue in force an act, therein mentioned, relating to the port of Baltimore," explaining that the act expired on the 4th of March; which was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LINCOLN in the Chair, and took up said bill.

Mr. C. briefly explained the object of the bill, and of the original bills of 1791, 1800, 1814, 1822, and 1828, of which this was a continuation for five years.

Mr. REED opposed the bill, as involving the principle of levying special duties for individual cites, and if the harbor wanted improvement, let it be done by direct appropriation, and not coerce the city of Baltimore to levy extra duties upon its tonnage for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD made his acknowledgments to the gentleman from Massachusetts for his concern for the interests of Baltimore, but he gave the gentleman his assurance that the passage of this bill was desired by that city, and both himself and his honorable colleague had received sundry letters from the Mayor and others of Baltimore to that effect, showing it was the general desire of the community.

On motion of Mr. H. the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House, and it was read a third time and passed.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1838."

The question pending was on the following amendment, to come in as an additional section, submitted yesterday by Mr. CAMBRELENG:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the collectors, deputy collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and their respective clerks, together with the weighers, gaugers, measurers, and markers, of the several ports of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as will give to the said officers, respectively, the same compensation in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, according to the importations of that year, as they would have been entitled to receive, if the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, had not gone into effect: Provided, That no officer shall receive, under this act, a greater annual salary or compensation than was paid to such officer for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two: and that in no case shall the compensation of any other officers than collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and clerks, whether by salaries, fees, or otherwise, exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars each per annum; nor shall the union of any two or more of those offices in one person, entitle him to receive more than that sum per annum: Provided, further, That the said collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, shall render an account quarterly to the Treasury, and the other officers herein named or referred to shall render an account quarterly to the respective collectors of the customs were they are employed, to be forwarded to the Treasury, of all the fees and emoluments whatever by them respectively received, and of all expenses incidental to the respective offices; which accounts shall be rendered on oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form and supported by such proofs, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will, in his judgment, best enforce the provisions of this section, and show its operation and effect: Provided, also, That, in the event of any act being passed by Congress, at the present session, to regulate and fix salaries or compensation of the respective officers of the customs, then this section shall operate and extend to the time such act goes into effect, and no longer: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to extend to the collectors at such other ports where a surplus of emoluments have been accounted for and paid into the Treasury in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-two, the privilege granted to the collector of New York, to take effect from the first day of January last.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the money arising from the sale of the old furniture in the President's house shall be applied to the purchase of new furniture for the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the unexpended balances of appropriations for compensation to the clerks in the offices of the surveyors general of public lands be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, in addition to the sums appropriated by this act, for the same purpose.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike out the last proviso of the first section of the above amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON objected to this amendment, on the ground that this was conferring a special favor upon this collector.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the collectors had heretofore been in the habit of making a distribution of a certain surplus fund in their hands, as a part of the salaries of their clerks. In the instance which this proviso was intended to remedy, the money had been paid into the Treasury; and consequently, it was necessary, in the last appropriation, that this provision should be inserted, to enable these clerks to obtain their pay. He himself thought the practice was an improper one, and hoped the salaries of these clerks would hereafter be paid like the salaries of all other clerks under the Government.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought, then, that the proper course would be for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a proposition to regulate the pay of these officers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that it was unnecessary to introduce a proposition to regulate the pay of these officers, as there was a bill before the Committee on Commerce for this very purpose.

Mr. REED said he had a few remarks to make, but there was no House here to make them to.

The CHAIR then appointed tellers to count the House, when it was found that there but seventy two members in their seats: no quorum.

The committee then rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. McKAY then moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and the roll nearly called through; when,

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, the call was dispensed with, and the House again went into Committee of the Whole.

The motion to strike out the proviso was then agreed to.

Mr. REED was opposed to the amendment, because he considered that it would operate to the benefit of the officers at New York, and some other of the large ports, and be an injury to those at other places.

Mr. MALLORY supported the amendment of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and expressed himself as being opposed to the passage of the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PETRIKEN considered that there was a great abuse existing in relation to these custom-house officers, and the abuse originated in Congress, and not with the Executive.

During the period of the high tariff system, when perhaps they had heavier duties to perform, they got their numbers increased, and salaries fixed at a high rate, and have continued to enjoy those high salaries ever since, although many of them performed but little service to the country. In fact, in some of the large cities, some of these offices were mere sinecures; and this he considered was a matter which the House ought to remedy. In the city of Philadelphia, some of these officers receive some six or seven thousand dollars a year, and have nothing to do themselves but walk about with their hands in their pockets, other persons doing all the work. There was a host of these officers throughout the country, and he trusted Congress would take up the matter, and act upon it with a view to correct the evil existing.

We have heard a great deal about corruption in the Executive departments, and all that sort of thing, in this House, but here was a chance for gentlemen to correct abuses; and he hoped they would improve the opportunity, and walk up to the work, and correct existing evils. He would meet gentlemen on this question, and give them all the aid in his power, if they would go with him in this matter. He should vote against this amendment, and in so doing, he hoped he would be enabled to vote upon the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce before the close of the present session.

Mr. CUSHMAN replied to the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MALLORY) and stated that the Committee on Commerce had examined the subject of the salaries of these officers, and he had no doubt that justice would be done to them all in this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina opposed the amendment, because he considered if it was adopted it would have a tendency to prevent the passage of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce to regulate the salaries of these officers. He was anxious to see that bill passed, so that we might know what we were giving these officers for their services, as it seemed to him that we did not now know what we were doing with respect to these officers. He trusted this amendment would not prevail.

Mr. McKIM expressed his opinion that the bill to regulate the compensation of custom-house officers, or some measure to that effect, should be passed; but, in view of the difficulty that had invariably occurred in calling it up, for years past, he could barely anticipate it, and it was on that ground that the Committee of Ways and Means had reported the amendment now under consideration. If the amendment was not concurred in, and the bill should not be reached, what would be the effect? Why, that the custom-house officers would be in danger of receiving no pay at all.

In reference to what had fallen from the gentlemen from Massachusetts and N. Carolina, he thought they labored under a mistake in saying that many of the officers received more than they were entitled to by law. It could not possibly be so; and he had turned to the "Blue Book," which demonstrated no such fact, except where the two characters of weigher and gauger may be united. But even then it appeared they received less than they were allowed, for each was authorized to receive $1500, whereas, when the two were united, they only received $2,600. The gentleman from North Carolina was especially apprehensive that they did not know what they were about. Turn to the "Blue Book" and they could see the compensation paid to every officer of the Government for years. There was no difficulty whatever on that subject.

Now, with respect to the amount of compensation proposed by this amendment, and that contemplated by the bill referred to, Mr McK. had given the subject some consideration, and he had no hesitation in expressing his belief, that the latter provided a much greater remuneration than the former.

The gentlemen from Massachusetts had also fallen into another error. The gentleman had stated that the collectors in the larger ports, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, &c. received, in addition to their other compensation, a commission upon the amount of duties and importations in the form of a certain per centage, thereby augmenting their salaries to more than they were entitled to. That was an obvious mistake; for, whatever they received above a certain sum, they were bound, by law to pay into the Treasury.

For instance, the collector of New York could not receive more than about $4,400 per annum, the one at Philadelphia about $4,000 he believed, and the one at Baltimore the same. All they derived over that was paid into the Treasury; but it was within his own knowledge that, for many years past, the salary of the collector at Baltimore had fallen within the compensation allowed to him. He would venture, unhesitatingly, to add, that none of the officers of that city had ever received more than they ought. If any officer, be he stationed where he might, did so, Mr. McKIM would be for instantly having him turned out

Mr. PETRIKEN mentioned some cases at Philadelphia, where the chief officer hired others to do the duty at as cheap a rate as possible, while he walked about at his leisure, with his hands in his pockets, doing no duty, and drew the whole salary, appropriating the difference to his individual profit.

Mr. McKIM did not stand there as the apologist of any officers; and all he would say to the gentleman was, that if they were guilty of such tricks in Philadelphia, they were unknown in Baltimore.

In conclusion, though he had affirmed his belief that the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce to regulate the pay of custom-house officers increased the salaries, yet he wished some measure passed for the permanent regulation of the subject, but he saw little chance of its being reached at the present session. He hoped it would, for it ought, as all salaries should be fixed by law.

Mr. REED read from the Blue Book an instance of the weigher and gauger of Boston receiving more than $2,000, and said this was one instance of more than $1,500 being received, although the gentleman from Maryland had said that these officers could not receive more than $1,500.

Mr. McKIM explained that the weigher received by law $1,500, and the gauger $1,500; and if the people of Boston united these offices, he had only to say that they did not do so in Baltimore.

Mr. REED opposed the amendment, because, he contended, it would provide for but a few cases, and it would do great injustice to many others. He intended, hereafter, to offer a resolution, calling on the Department for information in relation to these salaries, and then he hoped the House would be enabled to act upon the subject understandingly.

Mr. PHILLIPS contended that the whole system was corrupt, and needed to be reformed throughout, and he hoped the House would take up the subject and act upon it, and make such reforms as was necessary. He was opposed to the Committee of Ways and Means interfering with this subject. The matter belonged exclusively to the Committee on Commerce; that committee had paid a great deal of attention to it, and he had no doubt but they would do it all the justice which was required. He considered that we had arrived at a crisis in our financial affairs, and if we were to have a certain measure—the Sub-Treasury system forced upon us, and have the whole standard of value reduced, it was time that a reduction should be made in all the salaries of public officers. If we were to have a pressure in the country, it was proper that the officers of the Government should feel it as well as the rest of the community. He thought it was time enough to pass this amendment at the eleventh hour, if it was necessary to do so. He trusted the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. LEGARE replied to the remarks of Mr. PHILLIPS, and contended that the salaries of these officers ought not to be reduced. He referred to the price of provisions in Charleston, and contended that it would be impossible for the customs officers to live upon less salaries than they now received. He considered that the best economy was to give these officers proper salaries.

Mr. REED replied to the gentleman from South Carolina, and stated that he was in favor of equalizing the salaries of those officers. Some of them received but five or six hundred dollars, and they were the officers who did the most work, while others received three or four thousand dollars and performed but little service. He was in favor of equalization, and hoped the bill for that purpose would be taken up and acted upon at the present session.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had hoped that this bill would not excite much discussion. With regard to the amendment under consideration, he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to make the amendment, because it was the opinion of that committee, that the bill introduced by the Committee on Commerce would not be passed at this session, in consequence of the discussion which it was expected would arise upon it. It was necessary that this amendment should be adopted, so that the custom-house officers in some of the smaller ports might receive the salaries which they ought to receive. If it was not passed, some of your custom-house officers would not receive sufficient to support them. With regard to the custom-house officers of New York, it made no difference at all to them, because they would receive their maximum salary without it, but it would be different with the officers at Salem, Massachusetts, Charleston, Norfolk, and some other places. He trusted the amendment would be agreed to.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON of Louisiana, and ADAMS,

Mr. BRIGGS raised the point whether this amendment was in order, under the rules of the House, and referred to the rule on the subject.

After a few remarks by Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG the committee then rose, and the CHAIR reported the question of order to the House.

The SPEAKER stated that this question did not come within his jurisdiction.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole; and the amendment under consideration was decided to be out of order, and fell.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved another amendment in relation to an appropriation for the purchase of furniture at the President's House.

Mr. BRIGGS raised the same question; and

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order; and the point was discussed for some time by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, McKAY and BRIGGS, when the committee rose and reported.

Mr. BELL gave notice of an amendment he intended to move to the above bill.

Mr. REED, on leave, submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a report of the amount of additional compensation received by revenue officers in 1837, under the provision equalizing the same to what they would have received if the bill of 1832 had not passed; which was concurred in.

Mr. HENRY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to use their influence to procure the establishment of a national armory on Big Beaver river, at or near Pittsburg; and if authorized to be on the waters of Beaver, they grant the use of the water for said establishment to be taken out of dam No. 5.

On motion of Mr. H. referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Petitions, &c. were, on leave, presented by Mr. RANDOLPH of New Jersey, and Mr. MORGAN of Virginia; when,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 7, 1838.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Topographical Bureau, together with sundry documents relative to the recent survey of the Kaskaskias and Illinois rivers, called for by a resolution of the Senate; and

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, three hundred additional copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented the proceedings of an unusually large and respectable meeting of the Democrats of the city and county of Philadelphia, friendly to the General Government, and opposed to the Independent Treasury bill as introduced into the Senate of the United States by the Hon. SILAS WRIGHT, on which occasion General Robert Patterson presided, aided by Thomas D. Grover, Richard Mackay, Houston Smith, John Floyd, jr. Hugh Catherwood, Alexander McCaraher, Peter Hay, J. M. Linnard, William Stephens, Joseph Burden, Samuel Badger, B. W. Richards, Alexander McClurg, James Pearson, John Naylor, James Goodman, and Morton McMichael, as Vice Presidents.

Mr. McK. said he could not refrain, on this occasion, from expressing his pride and pleasure in finding the course he had steadily pursued on the momentous question of the Sub-Treasury thus publicly approved by such men, and he honestly concurred in all the views of the meeting on the subject. He was personally acquainted with the most of them. They were men of the highest moral and political standing, and patriarchs of Democracy, who give healthful tone to public sentiment. He recognised among them the editor of the paper which publishes "by authority" the laws of the Union, and all of the electors, five in number, belonging to the city and county of Philadelphia, who gave their votes one year since for Mr. Van Buren; and he believed that was the only instance in which he had differed from them politically. Among other things, they "Resolved, That we meet this question openly and fairly, without disguise and regardless of all dictation." He said he was pleased with this, as he liked to see men, who, conscious of their rectitude, stand firm and unwavering. It would not do (he said) to denounce such men as bank hirelings and aristocrats, or we shall soon reduce our Democratic forces too low for effective service. He moved that the resolutions be read, printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. KING asked if the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not reading from a newspaper.

Mr. McKEAN replied that he had been reading a copy of the proceedings of this meeting, which had been cut out from a newspaper, and enclosed to him in a letter by the Chairman. He hoped they would be read, and the Senate would then see what they were.

Mr. KING did not care about the reading of the paper. What he objected to, was the reception of such matters, coming in the shape of a public newspaper. It was not authentic enough to be presented to the Senate, and it was not usual to receive papers of that character. If it was the wish of the parties that these proceedings should be presented to the Senate, they had nothing to do but to send their written account of them, signed by their officers, and then they would be presented in a responsible manner. If, said Mr. K. on the other hand, we depart from this course, we shall be subjected to receiving all the newspaper controversies of the whole Union. He did not object to the reception on account of the matter contained in the paper, but to the character of the paper itself.

Mr. McKEAN said, that though it was a copy cut from a public newspaper, yet its authenticity was vouched for by the letter of the chairman, addressed to him.

Mr. KING said that the letter of the chairman did not alter the character of the paper at all. This was the mere account of a public meeting cut from a newspaper and sent here by the President. How was the Senate to know that the signatures were genuine? Were the individuals, whose names were printed in that paper, the persons who signed it. There was no certificate of this fact. If, said Mr. K. we consent to receive papers such as this, we shall have the tables of the Senate burthened with all the newspaper controversies of the country.

Mr. PRESTON said he knew of no rule which compelled the proceedings to be in the original manuscript, or that copies of the proceedings of all great public meetings should not be forwarded by the people to their representatives in any form they might deem best. Mr. P. was not aware of what the prescribed course was on such occasions, but he recollected instances where memorials had been sent to the Vice President, and by him presented to the Senate, which were slips from newspapers. The most respectful course would doubtless be, to send original papers or certified copies. In this case, the letter was the autograph of the chairman of the meeting, stating it to be the memorial adopted at the time; and appended to it was the resolution directing the proceedings to be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States, and to their Senators and Representatives in Congress; and he was persuaded there could be no well grounded objection to its reception.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that he had received a letter, some days ago, from General Patterson, of Philadelphia, requesting him to present these proceedings to the Senate. By the same mail he had received a number of the American Sentinel containing the proceedings. He would most cheerfully have presented them, as published in that respectable journal; but on consulting with members of the Senate, who had been here in 1834, when similar questions were raised, he was informed that it would be a violation of the established practice of the Senate, to present them in a newspaper of the day. He had immediately written to General Patterson, informing him of this practice, and suggesting that he should send the original or a certified copy of the proceedings, when they should be presented with pleasure.

Mr. B. was no stickler for forms. He entertained no doubt but that the proceedings presented were a correct copy of the original. He thought they ought to be received by the Senate, and hoped the Senator from Alabama would withdraw his opposition to their reception. It was at best but a question of form, not of substance.

Mr. KING observed that, having examined these papers more fully, he would withdraw his objections to their reception. The individual who signed the letter to the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. McKEAN) having stated, under his own signature, that the printed paper was a copy from the original minutes of the proceedings, he thought that it might be received.

The proceeding were then read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the memorial of eight thousand some odd hundred citizens, all, he said, legal voters of the city of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the Independent Treasury bill. Mr. T. said that the people did not dream that, after this measure had been put down in the popular branch by so triumphant a majority, as it was at the extra session, it would again have been presented to the consideration of Congress. Unfortunately, these hopes had proved fallacious, and it was not until lately that fears began to be entertained that the measure would pass the other branch of the National Legislature; and hence it was that alarm had been justly excited, and the subject viewed as one of the most dangerous ever presented to the American Congress. Mr. T. said that but a few days had been employed in procuring these signatures, and no doubt the names might have been trebled in the same space of time, as not one legal voter in a hundred but would cheerfully have signed it. We might now find thousands upon thousands ready to lift their voices, and make their appeal to the Government, against the adoption of a system so fraught with destruction to all the great leading interests of the country. Commerce and inland trade were prostrated and broken down. At this season of the year, when, heretofore, in that great commercial emporium, all was life and gayety, and the busy hum of industry resounding through the streets, the stores there were shut up, and houses left untenanted; and what had occasioned this sad and melancholy change? Let the course pursued by the past and present Administrations in relation to the currency, answer! There were now hundreds upon hundreds driven from their homes in that city, seeking employment to earn that subsistence which the present state of things denied them there. To these poor wanderers in search of honest bread no relief was held out; nothing to cheer them in their expectations, or lead them to anticipate the comforts and honest independence they had before enjoyed; on the contrary, nothing stared them in the face but additional embarrassments, increased by the mad folly of persisting in measures adverse to all the interests of the people. He could tell gentlemen, if the course was persisted in, not only the Administration, but the Government itself, would be destroyed. We had now an empty Treasury; the sources of revenue dried up; commerce and inland trade were languishing to the last degree; and if this Congress adjourn without doing something for the relief of the people, the consequences would be disastrous in the extreme. New York usually contributed three-fifths of the whole revenue, but now it would raise scarcely enough to be counted any thing, and the prospect was still worse; unless that city could pay some $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 into the Treasury, there would not enough be received to carry on the Government, and it would, at this session, have to resort to another loan of $15,000,000. Why, then, should gentlemen seek to push through a measure fraught with so much evil, against the remonstrances of the people? Mr. T. then moved that the memorial be read, printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that they had had presented this morning a series of resolutions from a large and imposing meeting held in the great city of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the Independent Treasury bill; and the honorable member from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] now presented the memorial of 8,000 citizens of the city of New York against the same measure. The honorable member supposed that this memorial, and other late movements among the people, had been caused by a new-born fear that this measure, against which they remonstrate, would pass. Sir, said Mr. W. I wish I could say that in my judgment I have no such fears. I say that there is great danger; and I know enough of public affairs to predict the fate of a measure so important to the Administration, which has been so long in agitation. The members of both Houses had been long from their constituents; it was three months since they left their homes; and when they should come to give their opinions, it would be three months more; so that there would be six months intervening between their immediate connection with their constituents and their voting on this measure. Now, under such circumstances, he undertook to say that there was great danger of the passage of this bill, unless it was arrested by public opinion out of doors. There is danger, said he, on our side; and, on the side of gentlemen opposed to us, hope and confidence. If these proceedings indicated the alarm of people out of doors, he believed the alarm was well founded. He hoped that, instead of treating these memorials as fancies, gentlemen would pause, and seriously consider the matter they contained. But he feared that these meetings would be represented as agents and tools of the bank; and that the respectable gentlemen who attended this great Philadelphia meeting would be represented as under the paw of the monster. I do pray gentlemen, said Mr W. that, laying aside all projects and schemes, they will do something to enable the banks to resume specie payments. Without saying more, he earnestly desired to draw the attention of gentlemen to these memorials.

The memorial was then read.

Mr. WRIGHT said he should at this time, as upon all former occasions, enter into one of these incidental morning debates, arising upon the presentation of a petition, with extreme reluctance. After the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] however, and those which had fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] he felt himself compelled to enter his respectful dissent from the positions taken by those gentlemen, lest his silence might, by possibility, be deemed an assent to them.

The petition was from the common constituents of his colleague and himself. It was numerously signed, and he doubted not the petitioners were as respectable as any other body of citizens, of equal numbers, who had addressed Congress upon this interesting subject. He was happy to see their expressions of opinion meet this marked attention from the Senate. These, like all the other citizens of the State, had a right to claim for their opinions and interests, the most respectful and faithful consideration of himself and his colleague. From his colleague they would certainly receive that attention, and it was his firm determination that they should receive it from him also. He rejoiced that they possessed an equal right with himself to speak here. They had spoken, and they should be faithfully and patiently listened to by him, and, so far as his convictions of duty would permit, their wishes should be binding upon him.

Still it could not be new to the Senate, or to his respected colleague, and it certainly was not new to himself, now to learn that there were many, very many, among his constituents who differed from him, radically, upon questions of political principle and questions of political policy. This petition was but one of many proofs which had come before the Senate, since he had been a member of it, to prove that fact. It had been his design, upon all former occasions, to treat such petitioners with every respect, and to give to their opinions and wishes every aid which principle and duty would permit. The same design actuated him upon this occasion, and he must not, therefore, in any thing he should say, be understood as indulging the language of complaint or censure, because this respectable portion of his constituents had condemned, in advance, a measure which he had aided in bringing before the Senate, and the adoption of which he considered essential to the best interests of the country. On the contrary, he commended them for their free expressions of opinion, upon this and all other great measures of national policy, and it was not to make a single remark in relation to any thing embodied in the petition, for which he had risen. It was, as he had before stated, to express his dissent from the remarks of his colleague made upon the presentation of the petition.

His honorable colleague had assumed, in the broadest terms, that the present derangement of business and distresses in the country had arisen from the acts of this Government. This, in his opinion, was a mistaken assumption. The immediate cause of the derangement and distresses was the present condition of the banks of the country; their inability to meet their obligations and perform their chartered duties; in short, their universal suspension of specie payments. Was there a member of this body, was there a person within the hearing of his voice, who would deny this proposition? He could not suppose there was. He knew well, however, that there was a wide difference, and a great variety of opinion, about the causes which had produced the suspension by the banks. It was not now his intention to go into that discussion. He had, upon a former occasion, given to the Senate, briefly and partially, his views upon that subject, and others had given theirs. He was satisfied that the causes assigned upon all sides had had their influence upon that result, but in very unequal proportions, and that any acts, of any department of this Government, were among the secondary of those causes. All this, however, was not very material to his present purpose, which was to compare the declarations of the banks and their friends, at the time of the suspension, with subsequent events and present representations.

What was the immediate cause of the suspension, as given by the banks and bankers, at the time it took place? Not, as all will recollect, the ulterior inability of the banks to pay their debts! No, this was strenuously denied, and the banks declared as perfectly sound and solvent as they had ever been: but it was said that we had over-traded, had imported beyond the proceeds of our exports, and had thus accumulated, in the hand of foreigners, a fearful amount of debt against our merchants; that this foreign debt was making pressing and insupportable demands upon our banks for specie for exportation; and that the banks were forced to suspend specie payments, to prevent an entire drain of the specie from the country, and give time for the crop of 1837 to be applied to the reduction of that foreign debt. A resumption was promised so soon as the foreign demand for specie should cease.

What results have time and the healthful action of a prudent business produced? How are foreign exchanges at this moment, and how have they been for about a month now last past? Bills on England are actually below par in the principal commercial cities. They have been at and below this point for some weeks. Will it, then, be pretended that there is yet a foreign demand for specie? that if the banks unclose their vaults, the specie will be exported and the country drained of it? No: the indications are strong and universal of a large influx of specie, growing out of the present state of the exchanges. Such was the information he derived from the public press, and especially from several commercial papers opposed to him in politics. Still the banks had not resumed specie payments; and were they soon to resume? This was a question of the highest interest, of the most vital importance, to the business and prosperity of the country. He was most happy to be able to say he had new hope upon this point. He had seen, within the last few days, that the banks in the city of New York had resolved to resume, and make the attempt to sustain themselves in the full and perfect discharge of all their corporate duties and obligations on and after the 10th day of May next. He had not a doubt as to the ability of those banks, with possibly the exception of two or three, which were unusually involved, to sustain and carry out this just and praiseworthy resolve, if they could receive the countenance and co-operation of their neighbors in the other principal commercial towns; nay, he would go farther and say, if they were not warred upon by those neighboring institutions.

Still, at such a moment, when the first dawn of light begins to show itself in the East, we see the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] rising in his place and calling for further agitation of the public mind; inviting petitions from the people against a settlement here of a question which must continue injuriously to influence the public interests and to agitate the public feeling, until it is settled by Congress by positive legislation. They had seen panics here before. His honorable colleague and himself had seen rolls of petitions upon former occasions as large as that now upon the table. They had seen them from the same city, of which they and their State were justly so famed. They had heard invitations given here for agitation, for getting up meetings, petitions, and remonstrances, almost in the words which the honorable Senator had used in the morning. Who had forgotten the scenes of 1834 in this chamber? Who had forgotten the excitement which, from those scenes, was infused into the public mind in every part of the country during that memorable winter? Who had forgotten the deep and painful responsibility under which we all then acted? Still we were not then frightened from our sense of propriety or duty. Both himself and his colleague then stood firmly on in what they believed to be the path of principle and of duty, and neither could have forgotten what was the influence of the month of May upon that panic. It melted it away as it did the ice and snows of the winter, and all was seen to have been false and illusory; the phantom of excited minds, which, when reason returned, gave place to unexampled prosperity.

Did either the Senator from Massachusetts, or his colleague, wish to renew those scenes upon the present occasion? Did they hope that confidence in affairs of credit and money was to be established by universal and continued agitation? By a panic? It was proposed to postpone the bill to which the petition related until the next session of Congress, thus preventing any action in reference to the currency either of the Treasury, or of the country, during the present session, and both the gentlemen had declared that the motion should receive their support. Did they believe that pecuniary benefits to the country would result from carrying these deeply agitating questions to the polls of election? If not, why invoke agitation now? Why attempt to increase an excitement already rendered sufficiently deep and extensive by the depressed condition of our monetary affairs? And, above all, why attempt to delay action for another year, an thus force an uncertainty upon the country, for that length of time, more injurious than almost any proposed action could be?

The banks of New York deserved not only the thanks, but the countenance and support, to every possible extent to which it could be given consistently with paramount national interests, of all men and all interests. They deserved the co-operation of all the other banking institutions of the country, and most especially of those in the large commercial cities, in their earnest attempt to resume and sustain specie payments. This countenance and support he was sure his colleague and himself must feel the disposition to extend to them as far as a conscientious discharge of their public duties would permit, and as the first and most important step they could take, in his judgment, they should use their every effort to secure speedy, positive, and final action by Congress upon the subject of the currency and the safe-keeping of the money of the nation; to secure the permanent settlement of this exciting question of finance, that credit and confidence might have facts and certainties to rest upon; not a postponement of action, which would leave only hopes and fears, dangerous to credit and destructive to confidence.

He admitted that it was the duty of the banks in the city of New York to lead in the resumption of specie payments as they had led in the suspension. He admitted that their location also, and the commanding business importance of that great city, made this duty upon those banks more strongly binding. But as they were most promptly followed by all the banks of the country in the suspension, so ought they to be followed, with equal promptness and unanimity, in the resumption. Would they be so followed? Painful doubts seemed to hang around the answer to this important inquiry. He hoped, however, that they would discharge their duty to themselves, to their State, and to the country, and time would show whether the other banks would come forward and sustain and cheer them on, or would attempt an exterminating war upon them.

The most which Congress could do, was to act promptly upon the great subject now before it, and thus settle the public mind as to the course of policy which the Government was to pursue. Entertaining most deeply this conviction, he was rejoiced to hear it said here, this morning, by the opponents of the bill, that there was the prospect of its final passage. He hoped their apprehensions were well founded. He believed the very best interests of the country required that the bill should become a law. He believed that the highest and most essential interests of these respected constituents of his who had remonstrated against it, would be best served by its speedy passage. He therefore entreated Senators to turn their minds to action here, not to agitation elsewhere; to the settlement of this unprofitable controversy, not to the influences which may be exerted through its further discussion before the people of the country.

Mr. WEBSTER denied that he ever had expressed any apprehensions which he did not feel. In 1833 he did express his apprehensions that the State bank deposite system would fail; he had no confidence in it at the time, and foretold what the disasters of such a proceeding would be. The Senator from New York advocated the measure then, and predicted for it the most beneficial results. Had not his [Mr. W's] predictions been more than verified? Had not the Senator and his friends insisted that we should have a sounder currency and the exchanges better equalized; and now what was the result? Mr. W. said he did not fear to contrast his prophetic opinions with those of the Senator. The object of the prior Administration was to destroy the Bank of the United States, and the object of the present one was to get rid of the State banks. He had indulged the most serious apprehensions for the consequences that must grow out of so unnatural a warfare; and, if the measure before them was passed into a law, time would show whether these apprehensions were well or ill grounded.

The Senator from New York seemed to presume that the opposition to this measure was not aimed against the bill, but against the resumption of specie payments. So far as he [Mr. W.] was concerned, he could assure that Senator the feeling was quite the reverse. No man more ardently than himself desired to see specie payments resumed: and believing that the bill before them, if passed, would greatly impede so desirable a result, was the great reason why it was so rigorously opposed. The tendency of the measure was naturally to increase the difficulties and embarrassments, and to throw impediments in the way of the banks. And why? Because the specie, which was the basis of circulation, the Government proposed to take to itself, and keep within its own vaults. The evils the banks had to bear up against were of a twofold character, to wit: the pressure of the times, and the pressure of bad legislation, which called upon us to adopt a new system, by which the affairs of the Government were to be separate from those of the people: and this, said Mr. W. would in the end plunge the country into far greater difficulties than any which now exist. Mr. W. said that he had never believed that the resumption of specie payments by the banks would cure all the evils under which the country at present labored: it would not, for instance, settle the exchanges; that could only be effected by a well-regulated national bank. The resumption was, indeed, ardently to be desired; for he viewed the present condition of the currency as lamentable and deplorable in the extreme, such as could not long be borne by the labor and capital of the country. The great object was to restore it to its sound and pristine state; but some other mode would have to be resorted to than the present bill, which would rather retard than accelerate the measure.

Mr. TALLMADGE did not wish to call forth debate, nor did he think it likely, when the memorial was presented, that he would have done so. He felt it due, however, to the memorialists, to himself, and to the country, to place before the Senate the reasons why they presented themselves in such an attitude. They had not, until recently, believed that this measure would again be attempted to be pushed through Congress. When it was first put forth in the official organ of the Executive, under the authority of "a Mr. Gouge," it was looked upon as one of the wildest schemes that ever entered into the head of a wild and visionary man. Nor did any one dream that it had received the Executive sanction until it came in the imposing form of a grave recommendation to Congress at the late extra session. Well, sir, [said Mr. T.] the bill was produced, and underwent a long and animated discussion in this body, and was sent to the other house, (the popular branch of the legislature,) where it was put down by a decisive vote. Could any man have conceived, under these circumstances, that the same measure would be pressed upon the people against their solemn remonstrances? Had not the President expressed a willingness to co-operate in any measure if this should not meet the approbation of Congress and the people? Why then was this persisted in? Was it not from a settled determination to make the will of the people yield to Executive usurpation?

His colleague had said there was a great diversity of opinion among the people of New York as to the causes of the present distress; but he could tell him that it was pretty well understood to have been brought about, in a great measure, by the action of the Government? Was not the sad and forlorn condition of the country owing to the improper interference with matters that did not legitimately belong to it? He [Mr. T.] had said before, and would say now, and on all proper occasions, that the prior and present Administrations had mainly contributed to it. Mr. T. then adverted to the bill introduced for the distribution of all the surplus revenue, beyond the immediate wants of the Government, among the several States. He was satisfied with his own course on that occasion. He had deemed the measure right and proper. It was reported against in the Legislature of New York. The canals and other works of internal improvement were to be carried on, and the State had not the means to do it. It was argued that it could be effectually done if the State had her share of the surplus revenue. The affair was then taken up and supported as a party measure, and became one that was right and proper. The late President recommended it to Congress, and on another occasion reiterated the same doctrines, and held them forth to the people. When those who had constitutional scruples about the absolute division were prepared to make a mere deposite of it with the States, and after we had arrived thus far, we were suddenly ordered to wheel about and turn about, and take a back track. For that he was not prepared. All his life he had endeavored to pursue a straight forward course, and would not now be made to turn either a right or acute angle at the beck of political commanders.

The next step of the late President was the Specie Circular. He was not disposed to impute improper motives to the originator of this unaccountable proceeding; nay, he would accord honesty of purpose; but in its practical operations it had deranged the whole business concerns of the country; had broken up the exchanges, and diverted the specie from that portion of the country where it was wanted, to that where it was not. This was brought forward in the first instance as a legislative measure, in this body, and was voted down by every man save the mover. It was again brought forward in June, and again voted down with almost the same unanimity. It was then supposed a measure peculiarly adapted for legislative, and not executive, action! And yet what have we witnessed? Why, in a short time, with all the evidence before us of the manner in which it had been prostrated in the Senate, we find it adopted, in effect, as an Executive measure, in the shape of a Treasury order. When a Senator from Virginia had introduced his currency bill, calculated to do away the Specie Circular, which had passed by a triumphant majority, the President kept it for some days, and then, under the authority of the Attorney General, vetoed it. He would say there never had been known, in any country, to say the least of it, so great an act of impropriety in one branch of a Government against another. It was these things that had agitated the public mind, and occasioned one wide and general distrust for the stability and order of things.

If his colleague had lately passed through these heretofore busy streets, (Pearl and Pine,) and seen the number of splendid stores with that ominous notice "to let" on the doors, and the numerous houses untenanted, he could not fail to be convinced of the sincerity of the memorialists, when they asked that no additional embarrassment should be forced upon the trade of their city. Was it possible that he did not see the calls made on the humane and benevolent to come forward and aid those who had been thrown out of their daily means of sustenance at the late severe season of the year; and yet, when remonstrances were sent here, they were looked upon as emanations from panic-makers or bank agents. Mr. T. then made some allusion to the resumption of specie payments by the banks in May next, which his colleague seemed disposed to think would do much to cure the evils under which we labored. How had the banks been able to prepare for this state of things, but by calling in their entire circulation, and thus adding to the distress of the trading community? If this Indepenecnt Treasury bill was passed, it would create a demand for specie that would not only prevent the so much desired resumption, but end in the destruction of all the State institutions. Mr. T. concluded by expressing his belief that nothing was wanting but the helping hand of Government to inspire general confidence, and restore business to its wonted alacrity.

Mr. WRIGHT said, but for the necessity of correcting an essential error into which his colleague had fallen, in the reply he had thought proper to make to his former remarks, he should not have occupied the time of the Senate further in the course of this debate. His colleague had considered it to be his duty, with what particular relevancy to any of the topics involved in the discussion he had not yet been able to discover, to allude to the subject of the distribution of portions of the public revenue to the States, and to the acts and opinions of the late President of the United States and of himself, and the friends who had acted with him politically in their own State. He had spoken of their opinions upon the power of Congress over, and the policy of, these distributions, and had made them all out to have been, constitutionally and politically, friends of the system. This was the error.

It was true that, some years since, the Republicans of his State became alarmed at the rapid strides which the doctrine of prosecuting works of internal improvement within the several States, not only at the expense, but under the authority, and by the agents, and as the property of this Government, was making here. They also saw that a rapidly accumulating surplus revenue was giving to the doctrine dangerous strength and force, and that some means must be devised to avert a result so destructive to our institutions as the adoption of such a doctrine, and the extension of such a policy would necessarily prove. They saw attempts made in Congress to reduce the revenue to the wants of the Government without success; and as the less dangerous of the two alternatives, considering both as fearful evils, they did repeatedly, through their Governor, through committees of the Legislature, and, he believed, on one or more occasions, through expressions of the Legislature itself, give a preference to the plan of distribution, over that of a direct expenditure of the money by this Government upon works of internal improvement within the States. If the funds of this Government were to be applied to the construction of roads and canals within the States, they preferred that the application should be made by State authority, and that the works should be the property of the States, and under their jurisdiction, rather than that this Government should force its authority and its jurisdiction, and extend its property, its power and its patronage within the limits of those sovereignties for any such purpose. They did not, however, attempt to assume or express the opinion that Congress possessed the constitutional power to make the distribution to the States without an amendment of the Constitution for that purpose. In every message from a Governor, in every report from a committee, even including the report made by his colleague to which he had referred, and in every legislative resolution, the question of constitutional power in Congress to make the distribution to the States would be found to have been expressly reserved, as he verily believed. He spoke upon this point with great confidence, because it had repeatedly been his duty to examine those proceedings of his State since he had been a member of the Senate. Indeed he believed he had now in the drawer of his desk a printed copy of every document which would be found upon the journals and files of their Legislature. He well recollected that the first mention made of this subject was to be found in one of the messages of Governor Clinton, and that he reserved the constitutional question in express terms. He did not recollect that but one other Governor [Governor Throop] had ever brought the subject to the attention of the Legislature, and he knew he had followed, in this respect, the example of Governor Clinton. It was during his administration that his colleague made the report, as chairman of the canal committee of the Senate, to which he alludes, and he was sure, when that question was carefully guarded in all the other documents, he could not have committed himself upon it in his report. In any event, as his colleague had done him the honor to refer to his opinions, and to say that they, and all their political friends in the State, were then agreed as to the policy, he could assure him and the Senate that he had never himself entertained or expressed, but one opinion upon the point, and that opinion was that, without an amendment of the Constitution, Congress could not make the distribution proposed. That opinion had governed all his actions in Congress upon questions of such distribution, and controlled his vote against the deposite bill of 1836, in the form in which it passed the Senate, as, in that form, he considered it a distribution bill.

As to the expressions and communications of the late President of the United States, to which his colleague had so confidently alluded, he had only to say, if that distinguished statesman had ever any where contended for the power of Congress to distribute the surplus revenue among the States, without an amendment of the Constitution—had even admitted that power, or had ever expressed an opinion that it did exist—he had not seen the document; and he was confident a review of his communications to Congress would satisfy his colleague that he had mistaken their purport and meaning.

As he was up, he would reply to one single other remark of his colleague, and he begged him to believe that he made the reply without any personal ill feeling. No such feeling had existed in his mind towards his colleague, and he earnestly hoped no occasion would ever be given for the existence of such a feeling. His colleague had remarked, speaking of his own political course, that he had been all his life a straight-forward man, and that he could not now turn a right angle, or an acute angle, at the command of political leaders. He must have a curve, a rail-road turn, or, as the boys at school sometimes called it, a sweep of sixty to turn in. He [Mr. W.] did not doubt that his colleague had intended to be a straight-forward man in his political course, and he thought it likely he had convinced himself that he had been so. He, too, had intended to be a straight-forward politician, to govern himself by certain fixed principles, and to carry them out in all his actions; but he dare not say for himself what his colleague claimed, that he had been straight upon all occasions. One of them must have turned the angle or the curve, as they were very recently together, pursuing the same course, and entertaining the same opinions, and now they seemed to him to be very nearly opposites in opinion and action. Under these circumstances, he much preferred to leave to their common constituents the decision of the question, which had turned and which had kept "straight-forward."

He thought he had kept straight forward; but he was aware that a man lost, when intending to pursue a straight line, would almost invariably describe a circle. It was evident that either himself or his honorable colleague were now, and had been for some months past, lost, and that one of them had got just about half round the circle, and, so far as he was concerned, their constituents, and not themselves, should settle the question which was the lost politician.

In justice to himself, however, he must claim that he had some marks, some guide-posts, to direct his way and determine his course. He came into this body the friend of the late Administration, of its principles, and of its measures. He was selected by those who sent him here, because such were known to be his feelings and opinions. Finding no cause to change either, he had remained the friend and supporter of that Administration during its continuance, and during the whole of the period he found the talented and distinguished body of Opposition Senators upon his right uniformly opposed to him. A change of Administration came, and he contributed his humble efforts to place at its head the present President. He had long known that individual, and they had long been personal and political friends. He, therefore, became a supporter of his administration, and still remained so. He was daily told by the Opposition Senators that the present Administration was but carrying out the principles and measures of the last, and elaborate speeches had been recently made, and were now daily making, to prove, not only to the Senate, but to the country, that this was the fact. Could he, then, be inconsistent in supporting this, as he had done the last, Administration? But, again, he found the same distinguished Senators who had during the whole eight years led the opposition in the political warfare against the late Administration, equally leaders in opposition to this. They occupy the same seats and use precisely the same weapons in the fight. Upon all questions they met him, as formerly, in open and powerful opposition. If, then, he had been lost and travelling the circle, so necessarily must they have been upon the whirl, too, for the distance between them and himself remained precisely the same. They were exactly opposite at the start, and they were exactly opposite now; nor had there been any armistice within which they could have met and crossed each other. And, again, he now found himself surrounded by, and acting with, almost all (he was sorry he could not say all) of those who had ever been political friends. They too, therefore, had been lost if he had been, and yet continued to pursue the course with him, whether direct or circular. These considerations would certainly not only palliate his error, if he was in error, but would furnish him some apology for being somewhat confident that his was not the circular course.

A single word as to a remark of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and he had done. That Senator had said that in 1834, he had no confidence in the system of State bank deposites, but that I had, and that time has shown that opinions upon that subject were then right and that mine were wrong. I had then confidence in that system, and I expressed it freely, fully, and honestly. The trial of the system was made, and in less than four years, and that too during a period of the most abundant plenty and prosperity, it failed. This experience destroyed my confidence, and convinced me that the system was bad both for the public and the banks. I cannot, by volition, restore that confidence. I cannot believe that to be good, and safe, and beneficial, which has been proved, before my own eyes, to bad, and dangerous, and injurious. Has this experience changed the former opinions of the Senator. No. He tells us this day that he has no confidence in the State bank deposite system. Still this is the system which my honorable colleague urges upon us, and desires us to force upon the country, against the recent and positive experience of every business man in it. I, for one, cannot bring myself to such a course of action.

Mr. TALLMADGE made a brief reply to Mr. WRIGHT. Whatever might have been their devious political windings, there was no hostile feeling between his colleague and himself. With regard to the course which his colleague had pursued, he had been guided by the Executive index; as that had pointed in its revolutions around the political circle, so followed his colleague; and he must take care, said Mr. T. lest, in his wandering, he should be lost like the twelve tribes in the desert. If the Executive had been a fixed star, all might have been well with his colleague; but, instead of that, he was, to all intents and purposes, an erratic comet, and wherever the light of his tail appeared, there was to be found his colleague, directing his course in pursuit.

The memorial was then ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Wilmington, Delaware, recommending a site on the waters of the Brandywine for a national foundry.

Mr. WALL presented the resolutions of the Legislature of New Jersey, setting forth the peculiar advantages possessed by that State for a national foundry and dry dock: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. FULTON, the joint resolution from the House providing for the taking down of the walls of the burnt postoffice, was carried through the different stages, and passed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill as the special order, the question being on Mr. BUCHANAN'S motion of yesterday, to postpone the bill and amendment till the next session of Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN could scarcely persuade himself that there was any hazard in taking this vote. It appeared to him to be the best measure for the relief of the country, and he could not believe in the correctness of the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that any postponement now would be construed by the country as a decision of the great financial question before them. The country had been greatly agitated, and until there was a decision on this question, he did not believe that the mercantile community could be restored to their former prosperity. He solemnly believed that if this question had been settled at the extra session, that the commercial interest would have been relieved from the pressure so much complained of, and that those who now resist it will incur a heavy responsibility by so doing. He could not believe that there was any hazard in taking this vote, nor that this Congress would rise, without deciding a question so important to the best interests of the whole country. An affirmative vote on this motion would have all the effect of a rejection of the bill; and those, therefore, who were opposed to the bill in any shape, would vote for the postponement. They could not do more than decide the question for this session, for it undoubtedly, if postponed, would be renewed at the next.

Mr. MORRIS observed, that, at the commencement of this debate, he did not intend to utter a single word on this subject, nor did he intend now to assign any reasons for or against the bill. He rose to correct a misunderstanding as to the effect of his vote on this motion. He should vote against the postponement, and if that motion failed, he should vote against the substitute of the gentleman from Virginia. He should then vote for certain amendments which he deemed indispensable to render this bill acceptable to him, and if these failed he should be compelled to vote against the bill. He, therefore, did not wish the vote he now gave to be considered as binding him to any future vote. If certain amendments, which he should suggest at the proper time, should be adopted, he would vote for the bill; otherwise he should vote against it.

The question was then taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S motion to postpone the bill and amendments till the next session, and lost—yeas 23, nays 29, as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

Mr. PRESTON desired to know whether it was in order, at this stage of the proceedings, to offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by Mr. RIVES? On being answered in the affirmative,

Mr. PRESTON commenced in too low a tone of voice to be distinctly audible to the reporter; but he was understood to say that he was in favor of the substitute, provided it could be amended with certain improvements. He objected, also, that any preject of this kind, to be safely carried through, must be wisely administered by the Executive Departments of the Government; and he must say that he had no confidence in the ability of the officer who was to carry it on, and who seemed to have no liking but for the most wild and visionary schemes. It is a nice question of patriotism, said Mr. P. whether we ought not to stand by and see this measure carried through, because it is a measure of the Administration—whether it would not be better to give them this measure, and let them carry it out, and make the most of it, and thus let the failure which must ensue, rouse the indignation of the country against the experiment and experimenters; or, by a vigorous resistance, defeat it. He believed that the experiment would derange the commerce of the country, and derange the currency to an unexampled degree. But though he believed all this, he was not sure that this measure would not, in the end, be better than any, even the wisest measure, entrusted to this Administration, which had heretofore administered the wisest laws so injuriously. He did not know whether it would not be better to give them [the Administration] this law, rather than let them go on and canvass with it, to advance their Democratic, agrarian and loco foco measures. Give it to them, said Mr. P. and take these catch words of rag barons, shin-plasters, and irredeemable currency, from their mouths, with which they continue to agitate the country.

It was known to every man who had a bank note, and who had a debt to pay, that the Sub-Treasury system was now in full operation; and all they want, said Mr. P. is for us to legalize what they now already have. Mr. P. here complained of indisposition, and regretted that he had not the ability to go on in full. He would have been glad to show how destructive this measure would be to the prosperity of the country, and, as a southern man, to show his disapprobation of a measure calculated to break down the agricultural States, and make them subservient to a central power. He was anxious to show that its effects would be to cripple our commerce, and, by a reduction of this revenue, produce an increase of the tariff; and, as a State rights man, "born in the purple," "porphyrogenitus," he was anxious to vindicate the straightforward principles in which he had been nurtured, and show that it was impossible for him to support a measure so directly at variance with them. If a suitable opportunity occurred, he should do so; but for the present he should content himself with offering some amendments to the substitute, with the necessary explanations.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] had proposed that a system of financial agencies should be carried out through the medium of the State banks, and he would be glad to see such a system carried out; but a manifest objection to this was, the patronage which it conferred on the Executive. He had always been opposed to the union of the purse and the sword; and, if he had no other objection to the Sub-Treasury scheme, this would be a sufficient one. The same objection applied to the scheme of the gentleman from Virginia; and, to remove that, he proposed to offer this amendment.

It would be recollected that the banks to be selected as public depositories, were to be selected at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now he proposed that this selection should be by general principles, to be established by Congress. His first amendment, therefore, proposed that the public depositories shall be selected from such banks whose stock is owned in whole or in part by the States in which they are situated: and he was happy to be able to say that in almost every State of the Union, there were, at the points where it was necessary for the Government to have financial agents, banks, whose stock was owned either in whole or in part by the States in which they were. But if it should turn out that there were none such, then he would confide the selection to the States themselves; and the amendment proposed that it should be made by the Legislatures, when in session, and by the Governors in the recess. We have already decided, Mr. P. said, that the surplus public money shall be put in deposite with the States; and the very institutions in which the States have deposited this surplus, will most probably be selected. In the other case, the selection will be given to the Secretary of the Treasury; but in this proposition, this immense source of patronage and influence will be cut off. He should also propose an amendment to reverse, in some sort, the order of that part of the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, in regard to the mode by which he addressed himself to the banks, to induce them to resume specie payments. He should propose that the notes of all the banks in the country that are, in the estimation of the Secretary of the Treasury, sound, safe, and substantial, be taken for the dues of the Government, up to a certain day, say the first of August next; after which, none are to be taken but the notes of specie-paying banks. By these means, the Government would lend a helping hand to those banks which are not able to resume without its aid.

He had another amendment to offer which he would briefly notice. It had been supposed that the circulation of the Government funds, by banking institutions, produced too great an expansion of the currency. But that there was nothing in this objection, it would be sufficient to say that the falling off of the revenue, would itself stand in the way of too great an expansion. It was not in conformity with the genius of this Government, to keep its funds locked up from circulation, and he believed it would be politic in some degree to let the people have the use of the public money. But to guard against any danger on this score, he would propose that when the public money in any of the deposite banks exceeded a certain portion of their capital, that then the excess should be drawn in specie, and put in special deposite. The effect of this amendment would be, that when the Government had in deposite nothing but its ordinary revenue, sufficient to meet its annual expenditures, the banks might discount on it without danger of expansion. But when there was any extraordinary excess in the Treasury, sufficient to offer temptations to speculation, that then it would withdrawn, and placed out of the way of being banked upon.

Mr. PRESTON then submitted his first amendment as follows, stating that he would submit the others to which he had adverted, subsequently:

After the word "notwithstanding," in the fourth line, insert "that there shall be employed [twenty-five banks,] whose stock is owned in whole or in part by the State in which they are established; or, if there be none such, then those shall be employed which shall be designated for that purpose by the Legislature; or if the Legislature be not in session, by the Governor of the State in which they are established, and if no such designation be made upon application by the Secretary of the Treasury, "that they shall be chosen from the most solid and respectable banks in the States and Territories," &c. as in the bill.

Mr. MORRIS demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, which were accordingly ordered.

Mr. RIVES said that there was a part of this amendment to which he certainly should not object; but there was another portion of it to which there were strong objections. Believing that there was a growing opinion throughout the country in favor of the establishment of banks, the stock of which is to be owned by the States, and with their faith pledged for their solvency, he had no objection to the giving a preference to such banks as the public depositories. But with regard to the other part of the amendment, which proposed to delegate to the State Governments the functions of the General Government, by giving them the selection of its financial agents, he was entirely opposed to it. This Government was responsible for the exercise of all the functions committed to it by the Constitution; and it did not seem to him compatible with the harmony of our system that they should be delegated to another power. If the gentleman would modify that part of his amendment, and dispense with another, proposing the reception of the notes of the non-specie-paying banks, he would cheerfully go with him. His attention had been called to this latter proposition by the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, some days ago, who threw it out as a simple suggestion, and it was now formally offered to the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina. It was this: instead of providing, as the substitute to the bill now does, that the banks should resume by a certain time, their notes shall be taken for all the public dues, the amendment proposes to make them receivable at once, and to adopt the provision in the substitute excluding them, if they shall not resume specie payments after a given day.

After careful and deliberate reflection, he thought that there were objections to it, which are insuperable. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] referred to the practice under the administration of Mr. Madison of receiving the notes of banks which did not pay specie. Now he would observe, that there was not at any time during Mr. Madison's administration, a recognition by law of the notes of non-specie paying banks. On the contrary, such recognition by law was constantly resisted in Congress, as well as by the enlighted head of the Treasury Department himself. He saw, with the Senators from South Carolina, and Kentucky, [Messrs. PRESTON and CLAY,] that there might be a temporary convenience in their plan; yet it would establish a precedent that would be fraught with the most imminent danger. If our Government pursued its true policy, it would set its face against the reception of notes of non-specie paying banks; and he believed that it was in that way that the constitutional standard is to be preserved, not by requiring payments in gold and silver exclusivly. His attention, [Mr. R. said] had been attracted to the correspondence of Mr. Cheves with the Treasury Department, when he expressed the opinion, that but for the inflexibility with which the Government persisted in not authorizing the reception of the notes of non-specie paying banks, in the trying times between 1817 and 1819, they would all have again suspended. This principle has never been departed from in the legislation of Congress, and though there might be some small temporary convenience in the amendment, yet, for the reasons given, he could not assent to it.

[Here Mr. R. quoted extracts from Mr. Cheves's letters in 1819, while president of the United States Bank, to Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of the Treasury.]

He would suggest, for the consideration of the gentlemen from South Carolina and Kentucky, the inconvenience that would result from their plan if the banks should not resume payments by the time they proposed. If the banks should not then resume, there would be the same reasons for continuing the indulgence to them from time to time as now exist.

He believed, with the Senator from South Carolina, that there was a considerable delusion with regard to the policy and practicability of special deposites, and that nothing was wanted but an experiment of that plan to put an end to it. But he had already stated his views, in full, on the whole subject, and he did not deem it justifiable to occupy more of the attention of the Senate for the purpose of enlarging on it. He merely rose to state his opinion in regard to the amendments of the Senator from South Carolina, and he hoped that the sense of the Senate would now be taken on them.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, that in some remarks thrown out by him about a fortnight ago, he might have intimated that it would have been an improvement of the substiute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, to provide for the reception of notes of sound banks, though not now paying specie; but it never was his intention to propose any such modification, nor was he aware that the Senator from South Carolina was about to propose it. He thought neither project adapted to the wants of the country; and therefore, when compelled to vote, he should do so merely as a choice of evils, rather than through any confidence he had in the substitute. As the modification had been proposed by the Senator, he thought proper to offer a few words in its support.

The proposition of the Senator from Virginia, holds out to the banks, as a motive to resume specie payments, that the paper of such banks as shall resume by the 1st of July, shall be received in the Treasury. The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, is that the paper of all sound, safe, and unquestionable banks should be received at once for the dues of Government, until, say the 1st of August, at which time, if they did not resume, then the Government shall no longer be under obligation to receive their paper. If this suggestion were adopted, it would then be seen that it was a temporary measure of Government, to lift the country out of its present distress and despondency, by bestowing on the only circulation the seal and sanction of the Government itself. What would be the effect, if the Government should take the paper of this class of banks but to restore confidence between the parties. The Government would no longer be the great competitor in the market for the specie, nor the absorbent of that article. The specie of the country would then be left where it ought to be—in the vaults of the banks. It might be said, perhaps, that the effect would be to stimulate the banks to over issues of paper; but, asked Mr. C. would this be likely under the circumstances of the case? When they were informed that, unless they did resume by the appointed time, their paper would be discredited in the country, they would not be likely to be stimulated to any improper expansion; they would be more likely, in such a state of things, to be preparing for the resumption. The Senator from Virginia was opposed to countenancing the reception of irredeemable paper, and so was Mr. C. as much so as any man, except as a temporary measure of relief.

How stands the case now, said Mr. C. The Senator from Virginia voted for the ten millions in Treasury notes. What were they but irredeemable paper, post notes payable one year after date;—and the question is, what is the difference between the irredeemable paper of the Government, and the temporary reception of the now irredeemable paper of the banks? If the Government paper was better than that of the banks, then the Government paper should have the preference. But I refer to the state of the market to show that the Government irredeemable paper is inferior to that of the banks, in the transaction of the business of the country, and the payment of debts. But the Senator from Virginia further objects that there was no precedent for this during the administration of Mr. Madison, when this kind of paper was merely sanctioned by that high dignitary, and not received under the authority of laws.

Which was the most proper, that the money should be received by the authority of law, or the discretion of the Executive? Even at the period referred to by the Senator, when the necessity of the times was so great, it would have been better that this money should have been received for a short period on the authority of law, than in violation of all laws. The proposition of the Senator from South Carolina was merely a temporary measure, to relieve the pressure of these times, and was not likely to be of long continuance. Again, the tendency of this measure was eminently conservative. It would require the Government to use what was the currency of the people, and which, in fact, procured every thing now as well as heretofore; commanding as much in value, since the suspension of specie payments, as before. Whence was this state of things, unless the most implicit confidence was placed in these notes? and why should the Government not have confidence in that money in which the people reposed such unlimited confidence? Under all the circumstances, it might be the most politic course to pursue, to do nothing, to propose nothing, but leave the responsibility where it rests, until there was a disposition evinced by the party in power to obey the public will.

Mr. BUCHANAN was glad, once more, to be able most heartily to concur with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] in the sentiments which he had expressed on the present occasion. He hoped that there would yet be many occasions on which that gentleman and himself would again be found acting together; and as his instructions, even when construed in the broadest and most liberal sense, would not prevent him from expressing his opinion on this particular question, he should do so with peculiar pleasure.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had proposed what? Mr. B. did not doubt the devotion of that gentleman to the cause of State rights; but if he were to be judged by the proposition which he had advocated, one would not suppose that he felt any peculiar dread of Executive influence. What power did the gentleman propose to confer on the Secretary of the Treasury, at the very time he declared him incompetent to discharge the duties of his office? The tremendous power of selecting from the eight hundred banks of the country such as he thought proper, and of declaring that their irredeemable notes shall be received in payment of the dues of the Government, as equal to gold and silver. The Senator had been very careful to limit, as much as possible, the discretion of the Secretary in the selection of the twenty-five deposite banks, which is to be made under the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, after the resumption of specie payments; but, before this resumption, the Secretary alone is to decide what banks are sound and substantial, and what irredeemable paper shall be received by the Government. His discretion in this respect was illimitable. Such a discretion would be a more prolific source of Executive influence, under the existing circumstances of the country, than any other which could be devised. The power to distinguish between these banks, and to decide which of them were solvent and which were not, would place them all under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. The truth was, that if you attempted to distinguish between them, and to give the credit of the Government to some whilst you denied it to others, when all were equally insolvent, so far as regarded the redemption of their notes in specie, you would cast yourselves loose upon an ocean of doubt, difficulty, and confusion. It would be found utterly impracticable.

But, to proceed further: What was, in substance, the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina, and what would be its inevitable effect? It was to establish this precedent, that if the banks, by overtrading, should place themselves in a condition in which they are unable to redeem their liabilities, and thus forfeit the public confidence, that then you are to interpose; and by receiving and paying out their notes, you are to give the countenance of the Government to a depreciated and irredeemable currency. Let ingenuity exert itself upon this question as it may, still this was the practical result. By the precedent which you establish, you tell the banks that in time to come, they may expand their business to any amount they may think proper, without fear of consequences. You in effect say to them, go on; do not limit your business by your means of payment, and when the explosion comes, as come it must, the Government will ease you off on a bed of down, and will receive your notes as gold and silver, until you are able to redeem them yourselves. Would not this be the effect of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. B. said he would here proclaim that he was now, and had ever been, the friend of a sound and well-regulated banking system; and no act or declaration of his life would show the contrary; but it was asking too much from his friendship to require him to receive their notes in payment of the dues of the Government, after they had been compelled, mainly in consequence of their own extravagance, to suspend specie payments. For one, he could hold out to them no such inducement to resume. He believed it would be the most effectual mode of retarding, if not forever preventing, this resumption of payments in gold and silver, which was so much to be desired.

Mr. B. said that much had been said about the suspension of specie payments by the banks during the late war, and many parallels had been drawn between that suspension and the one under which the country was now suffering. He would ask what had been the cause of the former suspension? Was it not the patriotism of the banks at that time, and their devotion to the cause of their country? The banks south of New England, (and specie-payments were not suspended there) in order to accommodate the Government, had taken its loans when they were depreciated ten, fifteen, and twenty per cent. in the market, and had given in exchange their own notes. What was the consequence? Their specie was drawn from them, and they were left without the means of redeeming those enormous issues, by means of which the war was conducted. The Government, knowing that this suspension had been occasioned in the manner he indicated, had winked at the receipt of their notes in payment of the public dues; and the consequence was, it had on hand, he did not recollect how many millions of their irredeemable paper, of which we had so often heard, under the name of unavailable funds. But Congress had never sanctioned by any law the receipt of such paper.

He would ask if any such cause existed at the date of the present suspension of specie payments. The country had been for years in the full tide of prosperity. We had long been at peace with all foreign nations; our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures were in a most flourishing condition; when in a moment, like a clap of thunder from a cloudless sky, the banks exploded, and the commerce and trade of the country were prostrated. It is true that a few sagacious men, observing the vast expansion of bank credits and other causes which were in operation, had foreseen this result; but it was wholly unexpected by the mass of the people. Under these circumstances, Congress were now asked by the Senator from South Carolina to place the notes of these banks on the same footing with gold and silver, in payment of the dues of the Government.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had asked, what was the difference between the reception by the Government of Treasury notes and of irredeemable bank paper? and had contended that they ought both to share the same fate. Mr. B. would endeavor to point out the distinction. You found yourselves, said he, under the necessity of making a loan to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government. This necessity had been forced upon you solely by the inability and refusal of the banks to pay over the money which you had placed with them on deposite. You made this loan by the issue of Treasury notes, which, on their face, are not payable until one year after date. The faith of the United States was pledged for their redemption at the end of this period. The Treasury note was the bond of the Government, given to the holder of it, contracting that, when the year expires, he shall be paid in gold and silver. Could any gentleman doubt the security?

On the other hand, what was the nature of bank notes. These notes were payable on demand; and at every instant they remained unpaid in consequence of the existing suspension, the banks were defaulters. If, said Mr. B. I were to give you my bond, payable at the end of one year, I could not be called upon to discharge it before the expiration of that period, and hence am no defaulter; but if you hold my note, payable on demand, and I either do not redeem it on demand, or proclaim myself insolvent, and declare that I will not pay it if demanded, all mankind would justly say I was a defaulter. Such is the distinction between Treasury notes and bank notes. The one is a floating debt, not yet due, contracted for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Government, and assuming the form of Treasury notes, incidentally to aid the circulation of the country, which will certainly be paid at maturity; the other is the paper currency of the country, issued by the banks, payable on demand, and purporting on its face to be equal to gold and silver; and yet no one can say when, or whether ever, it will be redeemed. This was not a question, as the Senator from Kentucky seemed to suppose, whether the Treasury notes were below or above the specie or paper par in the market. They would be valued according to the opinion of their holders, and the uses to which they could be applied. But the public faith has never yet been sullied in regard to these notes; and it will be time enough, in case they should not be paid in gold and silver, when they become due, to compare them with irredeemable bank paper.

The Senator from Kentucky had said that to receive these irredeemable bank notes, in the manner proposed, would be eminently conservative. Mr. B. would be much pleased to examine this proposition; but he was in a narrow place, and could not perform this task as he would desire, without danger of passing the limit of his instructions.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, was not sure but Mr. B. had done so already. But he insisted that the true question was, which kind of irredeemable paper was of the highest value in the market. That of the banks was the money of the States and the people, and deemed of more value than the Treasury notes. If their value was precisely the same, then one was as good as the other, and as worthy of the acceptance of the Government. If their values were different, the most valuable ought to be cherished. Mr. C. further urged the importance of receiving bank notes for the public dues, to enable the banks to resume specie payments, and of sympathising with the people, by making use of the common currency.

Mr. BUCHANAN verily believed that this was a suggestion thrown out by the Senator from Kentucky without reflection; and that the more he reflected upon it, the more reason would he have to repent that it had ever been made. But his spirit was such, that when he made any suggestion, no matter how hasty, he persisted in it until the end. This debate was as little anticipated by him, as it could have been by the Senator; and until a few moments before he rose, he had not intended to take any part in it; but he would now continue it a little longer, whilst he replied to some of his [Mr. CLAY's) last remarks.

If Mr. B. understood the gentleman correctly, he had said, that, as the State Governments and the people received this irredeemable bank paper, therefore, the Government of the United States ought to act in the same manner. Now could any such inference be drawn from the premises assumed? Ought the course, which the State Governments and the people had been compelled to pursue by the conduct of the banks, be permitted to control the Constitution of the United States? That was the question. Are we to abandon that Constitution, which, when correctly construed, requires us to receive and disburse gold and silver, or paper which may at any moment be converted into gold and silver, and accept in payment of the public dues, to an unlimited extent, irredeemable bank paper? If we do, the paper currency of the country will sink into hopeless and irretrievable ruin. What had Mr. Cheves said upon this subject? As he was quoted by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] he had declared that nothing had prevented a general suspension of specie payments by the banks, in 1819 or 1820, but the inflexible determination of the Government to preserve the specie standard inviolate. What will now be the effect of adhering to the same standard? Not to give ourselves a better currency than that of the people of the country, as has been contended, but to place us all upon the same level, by banishing irredeemable bank paper from circulation. The State Governments will thus be induced to place such wholesome restrictions upon their banking institutions as will hereafter prevent a general suspension of specie payments. And here he would observe, that the idea of an exclusive metallic currency for the whole people of the United States was a mere phantom, which had been conjured up to alarm the fears of the timid. The best interests of the people, however, demanded that this Government should insist upon the payment of the public dues, if not exclusively in specie, at least in paper which was equivalent to specie.

In regard to the broad line of distinction which he had drawn between Treasury notes, payable one year after date, and not yet due, and irredeemable bank paper payable on demand, the Senator had not attempted to prove that he Mr. B. had been in been in error. His answer consisted in a mere repetition of the statement, that Treasury notes were not equal in the market with bank paper. This fact, even admitting its existence, as Mr. B. had shown before, had nothing to do with the question. But even if it had, what would be the result? Throughout the whole Union, Treasury notes had uniformily, he believed, commanded a premium, varying in amount according to time and place, over the local bank paper, except in New York, where they might occasionally have been under the paper par. It would have been most strange, had this not been the case; especially when we consider not only their undoubted security, but their perfect equately with gold and silver, at all times, and in all places, in the payment of the dues of the Government. No ingenuity could induce the Senate to believe, that the Government had forfeited its credit, by not redeeming these notes in specie, before they were due.

The Senator had not noticed that part of his argument which related to the vast power which would be conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, if he were authorized to decide what irredeemable bank notes should be received in payment of the public dues, and what should be rejected. It was not answered, and it was unanswerable. Such a power would be greater than had ever been conferred on any Executive officer, since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. CLAY here said that this discretionary power was only proposed to be given for four months.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that four months was an age in relation to this question. The great effort was to prove that the country had reached a deplorable crisis, and it was now essential that the Government should do something to resuscitate the State banks. What more could be done for such banks as the Secretary might select, than to receive their notes as equivalent to gold and silver in the dues of the Government: and could any thing worse befall the rest, than to make this odious distinction against them, and thus have their notes discredited by the Government? A continuance of this practice for four months would decide the fate of the banks and of the currency. It would place all these institutions under the control of the Executive. Before that period shall have elapsed, the banks really solvent will have resumed specie payments; and those which cannot pay their debts will have sunk into hopeless insolvency. So far as the Government was concerned, there can be, there ought to be, but one standard in regard to the solvency of a bank—is it able and willing to redeem its notes in specie on demand? Unless this question can be answered in the affirmative, its notes ought never to be received.

Now, in regard to the resumption of specie payments by the banks—and this was a subject on which he had bestowed much reflection—he would ask, what now existed to prevent it? We had been told by the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] at the late special session of Congress, that the country was then in debt to England forty millions of dollars. He believed that this estimate was too low, rather than too high. The rate of exchange was then heavily against us, and every effort was made to send cotton and to send specie out of the country, for the purpose of liquidating this debt. Under such circumstances, the banks could not have resumed. But all things have now changed. The energy and the enterprise of our citizens have, in a few months, reversed the former condition of our exchanges. The exports of our great staple to England have mainly produced this result. The foreign exchanges, which, a few months ago, were some twenty per cent. against us, have been reduced to six or seven per cent.; or, in other words, they are now two or three per cent. in our favor, being to that extent below the real par of exchange between the two countries. There can, therefore, now be no drain of specie from the banks to send to foreign countries. It must flow into this country, and not flow out of it. If, then, the debt which we owed to England; if the high rate of foreign exchange against us, and if the proceedings of the Bank of England compelled our banks to suspend specie payments, (and these were the reasons assigned by the banks themselves for the suspension,) what now, he would ask, compels them to continue that suspension? The Bank of England no longer, by her measures, restricts the American trade. She has become sensible of her own folly. Money is now plenty and cheap in England, and much capital there is without employment. Besides, our importations from abroad, when compared with what they were formerly, are insignificant; whilst our exports are as great as ever. And yet, with all these facts staring us in the face, we are told that the banks cannot resume without aid from this Government. Sir, they can resume, and will resume, without any such aid—I mean such of them as are solvent. Public opinion will compel a resumption.

He did not wish to set up for a prophet, or to add his name to the list of prophets on that floor. For once, however, he would venture to prophesy. He would say that the flux and reflux of the tides were not more certain, than that this country will witness a return of prosperity before the close of the present year. The one was governed by the laws of nature, the other by laws of trade almost equally certain. Let the Sub-Treasury bill pass, or let it be defeated; let the amendment of the Senator from Virginia be adopted, or let it be rejected: before the first day of January next, our trade, our commerce, our industry of every description, will revive and flourish. Nothing can prevent it, except some great national calamity, which no man can now anticipate. He judged of the future by the past. How long this prosperity may continue, he could not pretend to say. This would depend upon the action of the banks; and what length of time would be required again to expand the bubble of speculation to the bursting point.

It would be conceded by the Senator from Kentucky, that Mr. Biddle was an able financier, and that he watched the signs of the times with a skilful and practised eye. He did not doubt that gentleman's sincerity, when he expressed the opinion, a few months before the suspension of specie payments, in his letter to Mr. Adams, that the country had not over-traded. We were then proceeding so rapidly on the broad road to financial destruction, and we were all so infatuated with past prosperity, and so blind to our danger, that even Mr. Biddle considered the idea of our having over-traded as without any foundation. Now, if the Senator from Kentucky had established his great national bank, with Mr. Biddle at its head as his pilot, looking out to descry the coming storm, what would have been its condition? This bank would have gone down with all the other banks of the country. It could not have continued specie payments longer than the rest of these institutions.

The Senator from Kentucky had complained that he [Mr. B.] had made an unfair statement of one of his arguments. He knew the Senator would not accuse him of any such intention. The Senator had mistaken Mr. B's reply. He cheerfully acquitted the gentleman from Kentucky of any desire to make the present irredeemable paper system permanent. What he had said was, that should the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina prevail, it would be a most dangerous precedent for future times. The banks, looking to the present case, and expecting relief in the same manner, would expand their issues extravagantly whenever they thought proper, believing that if they were compelled to suspend specie payments, they might look to this Government for relief, by having their irredeemable notes received into the Treasury upon an equality with gold and silver.

After some remarks from Mr. PRESTON, the Senate, without taking the question, went into the consideration of Executive business.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, March 8, 1838.

Mr. BRIGGS, in order to obviate a recurrence of the difficulty which had occurred yesterday under the 63d rule of the House, asked leave to submit an amendment thereto.

The 63d rule is in the following words:

"63. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law."

Mr. B. moved to add the following:

"Or in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, with the usual contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Under the rule, this amendment would have to lie over one day for consideration, but Mr. B. asked leave to have it considered now.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. REED objected, on the ground that it was a matter of too much consequence to be adopted in haste. Let it be printed and lie over a day.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rule, but only 73, not two-thirds, voted in the affirmative.

AGRICULTURE.

Mr. DEBERRY moved the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the report accompanying the bill, in relation to the introduction and culture of tropical plants, &c. which, after a few words from Messrs. MERCER and DEBERRY, was agreed to.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. GRAVES reported a bill making an appropriation for the purchase of the Louisville and Portland canal stock, and 2,000 extra copies of the report were ordered to the printed.

PATENTS.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont reported a bill to authorize the Commissioner of the Patent Office to issue a patent to John Howard Kyan.

Mr. F. also made a favorable report on the petition of S. B. W. Douglass.

Mr. F. also made a favorable report on the petion of William Perkinson.

Mr. F. also made a favorable report on the petition of John Blank, so far as relates to the issue of a new patent, and unfavorable with reference to the residue thereof, all of which were laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. MERCER reported a resolution instructing the Committee on the Public Buildings to ascertain the cost of providing, within the Capitol, a suitable hall for the use of the House of Representatives; and if such could not be provided, to suggest such alterations in the present hall as would be convenient for the transaction of the public business; which was concurred in.

NEUTRALITY BILL.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Conference, on the part of the House, appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill in relation to our neutral laws, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and that the two committees had agreed upon a recommendation to their respective bodies, which, they thought, would carry into effect the views of both. The concurrence or rejection must first come from the Senate, and as soon as it did, Mr. H. would move to take up the bill and finally act upon it.

The unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, for granting land to the States for free schools, was postponed till to-morrow, on motion of Mr. HOWARD, on account of the absence of his colleague, from indisposition; and the House passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of Monday last, calling upon the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy for information relative to the accounts of, and appointments by, those departments respectively, of agents for the payment of pensions, accompanied by a copy of the report made to the Senate on the same subject.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

MAINE BOUNDARY.

The Message of the President of the United States in relation to the Northeastern Boundary line of the United States, and the bill proposed by Mr. EVANS, for running and marking the same, being the first thing in order,

Mr. FAIRFIELD, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House for the residue of the hour, in reply to Mr. EVANS.

After Mr. F. had concluded,

Mr. CAMBRELENG obtained the floor, and said he did not mean to make a speech, but, for once, to usurp the privilege of his friend from New Hampshire, and make an appeal to the House to take the question. The proposition was a very simple one, viz: to refer the President's Message with instructions to report a bill, and he considered the discussion very premature. Moreover, it was the only question which was arresting the progress of the public business; and he, therefore, moved the previous question.

The CHAIR stated that, after the most mature deliberation, he had come to the conclusion that the main question would be on ordering the bill to be engrossed

Mr. CAMBRELENG modified his motion by moving the postponement of the subject for a month, though he was willing to assent to any motion to commit the bill, for he thought it should be acted on; but he could not consent to have all the business of the country set aside for this one bill.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Messrs. CAMBRELENG, EVANS, and LINCOLN, the bill, by general consent, was committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and the question recurring on committing the Message, and ordering 2,000 extra copies to be printed—

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question thereon; but on taking the vote by tellers, no quorum appeared to be present, being ayes 45, noes 56.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then said as it was not probable a quorum could be got together to-night, and as the CHAIR stated that the motion for the previous question would come up in the morning, he moved an adjournment; which prevailed, and so

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 8, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, the contemplated National Armory ought to be established either on the waters of the Big Beaver river, in the county of Beaver, or at, or near, the city of Pittsburg, in the county of Alleghany."

"Resolved, That should the United States select the waters of the said river for the establishment of their Armory, then there is hereby granted to the United States the privilege of using the surplus waters of dam number five, at the west side of said dam, provided the same can be done without injury to the canal navigation."

"Resolved, That the Governor be requested to communicate the foregoing resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress."

Signed by the Speakers of both Houses and approved by the Governor.

The Committee on Military Affairs having already reported on the subject, the resolutions were read and laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of the representatives of Margaret Thompson, praying confirmation of title to a tract of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of sundry citizens of Maine, in number twenty-six, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and that the slave trade between the States may be abolished. The petitioners state that it is their intention to petition Congress on these subjects yearly till they accomplish their object.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the motion to receive this petition was laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS presented three petitions from Ohio on the same subject, and the motion to receive them was also laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio in opposition to the annexation of Texas to the Union: read, ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the committee of conference, appointed yesterday by the Senate, on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the Senate's third amendment to the Neutrality bill, reported that the joint committees had agreed to recommend for the adoption of their respective Houses the amendment proposed by the Senate to the second section of the bill, with the following amendment, to wit: insert after the word "whatsoever" the following words: "or with any other trade," so as to make the proviso read as follows: "Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with, any trade in arms or munitions of war, conducted in vessels by sea, with any foreign port or place whatsoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this act under the law of nations, and the provisions of the act hereby amended."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill thus amended sent to the other House.

Mr. KING presented several papers from Mobile, with certified copies of the costs incurred in the renewal of duty bonds at that port; which were referred to the Committee on Finance, who were charged with the consideration of the subject by a resolution adopted on motion of Mr. K. the other day.

Mr. DAVIS submitted a resolution calling for all the papers on file in the public offices relative to light houses, etc. which was adopted.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate all the information and correspondence in his office relative to the project of publishing a documentary history of the American Revolution, with a statement of all appropriations and expenditures for that work, and an estimate of all further appropriations to be required therefor to supply the 21st and 22d Congresses, and also to supply the new members of the 23d, 24th, and 25th Congresses.

Mr. BENTON said his object in making the proposed inquiry was occasioned by a letter found that morning on his desk from the Secretary of State, informing him that the first volume of the fourth series of the documentary history of the American Revolution, published under the act of Congress of 1833, had been forwarded, and requesting an acknowledgment of its receipt. Mr. B. said it was well known that he had, on former occasions, made the most strenuous exertions to stop appropriations for works that appeared to have no limit, and for which a former Secretary of the Senate had considered himself entitled to thanks for reducing some four or five hundred thousand dollars less than was originally contemplated by the parties. He thought the whole matter had long since been done with, and the appropriations stopped. His memory, however, it appeared, had deceived him. Who could say where this expenditure was to stop? Might not the new members of all succeeding Congresses demand their books of the same kind? Mr. B. denounced the whole proceeding as the most extraordinary piece of extravagance that was ever imposed on the Government or the people. The original proposition had been pushed through no one knew how; and it was, upon the whole, one of the most wasteful pieces of extravagance that ever came within his knowledg ; notwithstanding which, it appeared still to be going on, and the object he had in view was to place all the necessary information before the Senate, in order that a check should be put to such proceedings. Mr. B. said he had always been opposed to purchasing books for the use of members, and the course he should feel bound to pursue would be to send back the volume to the source from whence it was derived.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had a very general and indistinct recollection of what had occurred heretofore on this subject. He remembered that his impressions were decidedly against the whole affair, and he thought that no appropriation was made. All he had now to say, was that he had received a letter similar to that received by the Senator from Missouri, and that, with his impressions, he could not receive the work, but would be compelled to return it.

Mr. KING said that this was a case which had occupied the attention of the Senate several years ago. It was certainly a very extraordinary arrangement of the Secretary of State, under which this work was first commenced, and it turned out that this contract would involve an expense that no man could estimate. Millions might be expended under it before they could see the end of it. The Senate took the matter up, and referred it to a committee, who reported on it. It was then proposed that the contract should undergo a revision by the Secretary of State, for the purpose of receiving proposals from the contractors to bring the contract within some reasonable bounds. A proposition was accordingly made by them, and after it a law was passed to authorize the continuation of the work to a certain extent.

[Mr. K. here read the law, and explained the terms on which the work was allowed to be printed.]

Mr. K. said that though he was of opinion that this contract was a most improper one in the beginning, and was made with an intention to deceive, and though he and some of his friends did all that they could to stop it, yet, as Congress had taken the matter up and passed this law, they were obliged to go on with it, unless some mode could be devised of getting rid of it without injury to the individuals. Let us (said he) pay these men liberally for what they have done, and stop the expenditure which they could not tell how far it would extend. Let us, (said he,) instead of buying these expensive works for ourselves out of the money of the people, buy them, if we must have them, out of our own money. Mr. K. said he was opposed now, as he had always been, to the purchasing of books to be given out to members of Congress, though he did not think the measure now proposed was the right way to stop it.

Mr. DAVIS would not undertake to pronounce upon the merits of the present volume, because he did not know of what it consisted; but he happened to see some of the sheets of the other volumes, and as a work of documentary history, he would say it was invaluable, and was a work that could not have reached the public under any other agency than that of the Government. From his knowledge of the Senator from Missouri, he should consider him deeply interested in the events treated of in these books. He did not know what the original proceedings were; he spoke only of the excellence of the work.

Mr. BENTON said that he did not know how he could arrest the distribution of this work, till he could get the information to enable the Senate to act. His present application was for information, and on that information, the Senate would know what to do. As to himself, his course would be to send back the book to the Secretary of State.

Mr. B. then, at the suggestion of a gentleman near him, [Mr. KING,] modified his resolution, so as to require the Secretary to stop the distribution of the work until the information was furnished and acted on.

The resolution thus modified, was adopted.

Mr. SWIFT submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of repealing the duty on planks, boards, and scantlings, which was adopted.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before the Senate, so much of the correspondence between the Governor of Alabama and said Department, in March and April, 1836, including letters or extracts from them, as had reference to the probable danger of hostilities from a portion of the Creek tribe of Indians.

Mr. WALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from New Brunswick to Flemington, via Milestone, in New Jersey.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported without amendment, the bill from the House, making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1838.

Also, without amendment, the bill to provide for persons, disabled by known wounds, received in the Revolutionary war.

The bill from the House to continue in force the act therein mentioned, relating to the port of Baltimore, was read twice, and referred.

The amendment of the House to the Senate's bill to change the times of holding the courts of the United States for the 7th circuit, was considered, and concurred in.

The Senate then took up the Independent Treasury bill, as the special order; when,

Mr. PRESTON, by consent of the Senate, withdrew that part of his amendment, which committed the selection of the twenty-five deposite banks to the Legislatures of the States.

The question being taken on the amendment thus modified, it was rejected—yeas 19, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright and Young—32

Mr. BAYARD then, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the Senate in a speech of great length, in opposition to the bill, and at near six o'clock, without having concluded, gave way to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 9, 1838.

Mr. BRIGGS asked leave of the House to take up and consider the amendment submitted by him yesterday to the sixty-third rule of the House, as printed in the Globe of last evening, but the motion to suspend the rules for that purpose did not prevail, only 51 voting in the affirmative.

So the House refused to suspend the rule.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

On motion of Mr. McKAY the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of an Executive Message, and sundry memorials on the subject of a National Foundry, and the same were referred to the select committee raised thereon.

NEUTRAL LAWS.

Mr. HOWARD moved that the House take up the report of the Committee of Conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to one of the amendments to the bill amendatory of our neutral laws; which was agreed to.

Mr. H. explained the object of the amendment, (which is given in the Senate proceedings,) and stated that the conferees of both Houses were unanimous, and the Senate had already concurred in its part, and, after some further discussion between Messrs. HOWARD, FILLMORE, CUSHING, TILLINGHAST, ADAMS, HOLSEY and CORWIN,

Mr. HAYNES said, if he was capable of understanding the import of plain language, and, without pretending to scholarship, he had endeavored to understand his own language, there could be no doubt or ambiguity in the report of the Committee of Conference. It was true that there was some circuity, some circumlocution, in the phraseology of the report, but he would not quarrel about words and phrases with any gentleman who might, through the channel not most acceptable to himself, arrive at his own conclusion. The amendment proposed authorizes such trade by sea as is authorized by the law of nations and existing treaties, and goes on to give permission for carrying on all other trade equally authorized by existing treaties or the laws of nations. Certainly the trade by land was embraced by the broad terms "all other trade," as contained in the amendment reported and recommended to our concurrence by the Committee of Conference. We had heard much about the neutral right to trade in articles contraband of war. That point was not necessarily involved in the question now under consideration, but he begged leave to say, that such right stood, by the principles of national law, upon a very different foundation from that upon which gentlemen had attempted to place it. Sir, it was nothing more nor less than permission to the citizens or subjects of a neutral nation to run the gauntlet with contraband articles, subject to capture by the antagonist belligerant as lawful prize. The whole extent of the right contended for is, that the attempt of a citizen or subject of a neutral power to carry on contraband trade, shall not be cause of war against the nation to which he belongs. In fact, the alleged neutral right to trade in contraband stood upon no better footing than the right to smuggle. The smuggler runs the gauntlet in his attempt to violate the commercial regulations of another country, subjecting his commodites to be made lawful prize, if captured; and the nation to which he belongs shall not be considered as furnishing lawful cause of war by the illegal traffic of its citizen or subject. The right was not national in any aspect in either case, except so far, that neither the attempt of a neutral citizen or subject to carry on contraband trade with a belligerant, nor in any case an attempt to smuggle, shall be lawful cause of war against the nation, whose citizen or subject should engage in either of them.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. McKIM then moved the previous question on concurring in the report of the Committee of Conferees, which was seconded—ayes 78, noes 44, and the main question was ordered without a count.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 51.

So the report of the Committee of Conference was concurred in by the House, and the bill, therefore, finally passed, the House having been already notified that the Senate had concurred.

The House then passed to the—

PRIVATE ORDERS.

The first question in order was the motion made on a former day, by Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, to reconsider the "bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton."

After a few remarks by Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, McCLELLAN of New York, RANDOLPH, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, CRAIG, WHITTLESEY of Connecticut, and CHAMBERS,

Mr CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays on the question of reconsideration, which were ordered; but, without taking the question,

On motion of Mr. DUNCAN,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 9, 1838.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented fourteen memorials, signed by a very large number of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, requesting Congress to establish a Dry Dock in the Navy Yard at Philadelphia; and also a communication on the same subject from Commodore Stewart and Captain Henry of the Navy.

Mr. B. said that the character of the Commodore, as a brave and skilful officer, was known to the whole country; but it might not be so well known, that he was peculiarly distinguished for that strong, practical, common sense, without which no man was fit for the important business of public life, and for the ability and skill with which he applied this talent to every subject connected with his profession. It was this circumstance which gave great value to his recommendations; and the paper itself, presented on its face, abundant evidence that he had formed a correct estimate of the Commodore's character. If it should produce the same impression upon other Senators which it had done on himself, the object of the memorialists could not fail to be accomplished. It established the necessity, in time of war, considering our extended maritime frontier, of having at least six or eight dry docks, in order to render our navy efficient and secure, instead of the two which already existed at Charlestown in Massachusetts, and Gosport, in Virginia. It demonstrated the great superiority of what was called the lock dock, over the simple or single dry dock, such as the two already established; and that the navy yard at Philadelphia was peculiarly calculated to introduce this improvement, on account of the abundant supply of water, from a sufficient elevation, which could be obtained by means of the Schuylkill water works; that whilst the position of this navy yard was sufficiently remote from the ocean to render vessels perfectly secure from hostile attack, it was sufficiently near, by the use of steam tow-boats, for every practical purpose; and that another great advantage would be, that vessels lying there in ordinary would be free from the corroding effects of sea water on the copper of their bottoms, and from barnacles and other substances which adhered to them, and did them great injury. A very strong case was mentioned to prove this position. It had been necessary to send the Ohio, which had lain in ordinary for some time at the navy yard in New York, round to Charlestown, "to be docked and newly coppered, it having been found that the salines of the water had literally eaten the copper off her bottom."

He moved that the memorials, together with the accompanying communication, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that the communication be printed; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of sundry citizens of Rockingham, Windham county, Vermont, praying Congress to pass a law to suppress duelling: read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition of Ann, widow of George Wunder of Philadelphia, praying that the pension allowed to her late husband may be continued to her: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of John M. Jacocks, praying for arrears of salary as inspector of the customs: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred a resolution of the Senate on the subject, reported a bill to reorganize the district courts of the United States in the State of Mississippi; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and after spending a short time therein, the doors were opened, when

The following resolution, submitted some days since by Mr. WRIGHT, was taken up, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, be severally requested to report to the Senate—

1. The number of clerks employed in their respective Departments, and in the several bureaus connected with, or attached thereto, designating the number of clerks in each Department and bureau.]

2. The various rates of compensation paid to clerks, and the number of clerks in each Department and bureau, at each given rate of compensation.

3. The classification of the clerks as nearly as they may be able, in reference to the character of the labor to be performed, the care and responsibility imposed, the qualifications required, and the relative value to the public of the services of each class as compared with others; and especially whether, as the clerks are now paid, there be inequalities of compensation among clerks performing the same class of duties; and whether there be now classes of clerks receiving different rates of compensation where the duties performed are substantially equal in all the considerations which should govern the compensation.

4. Such changes and improvements in the classification of the clerks in the respective departments and bureaus, in reference to compensation, as justice to the clerks, and the interests of the public service, may seem to them to require.

Resolved, That the heads of the several departments above named, be requested to consult together, to compare the duties and rates of compensation of the clerks employed in each, and in the bureaus connected with or attached to each, with the others, and to make their suggestions and recommendations under the fourth sub-division of the preceding resolution, so far as they may be able, such as will secure a just equality of compensation, compared with the services required, not only among the clerks in each Department, and the bureaus thereof, but among the clerks in all the Departments and all the bureaus.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill from the House, making appropriations for the payment of the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, was taken up, and read the third time, and passed.

The report of the Committee on Claims, unfavorable to the petition of the legal representatives of George D. Mitchell, was considered, and concurred in.

The resolution submitted the other day by Mr. NILES, calling for any correspondence that may have taken place between the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and the Bank of the Metropolis, was taken up; and after being amended on motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, was agreed to.

Mr. RIVES presented certain resolutions, signed by T. Smith, Chairman, and Wm. B. Benedict, Secretary, (of what meeting is not stated,) in favor of the passage of a law to suppress duelling: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill; when

Mr. BAYARD, who had the floor, concluded his speech in opposition to the measure.

Mr. MORRIS then addressed the Senate at length, and in a most powerful and eloquent argument, supported the principal features of the bill, and showed to what part of it he objected; after which,

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 10, 1838.

Reports from committees were called for.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. MORGAN reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Ball.

PATENTS.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont, reported a bill for the relief of John Blanc.

Also, a bill to renew the patent right of William Perkins.

Also, a bill for the relief of Stephen S. W. Douglas.

JUDICIARY.

Mr. MARTIN reported Senate bill, with an amendment, to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the 9th circuit; which, after a few words of explanation from Mr. M. was concurred in.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; read a third time and passed.

MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. COLES made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jacob Brown.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McKAY in the chair, on the bill to restore certain jurisdiction to the District Courts of the western district of Virginia.

Mr. GARLAND briefly explained the objects of the bill, and the necessity of its immediate passage so as to transfer the causes in time for the supreme terms.

Mr. BEIRNE opposed the bill, which, he contended, had not been called for by the people of Western Virginia, and could only benefit the members of the bar. The people had not asked for the repeal of the bill of last Congress, and he hoped it would at least have a fair trial, for which there had not been, as yet, sufficient time. Mr. B. moved to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. GARLAND rejoined, and said the people of all Western Virginia were greatly inconvenienced by the law of the last session; a law which had been passed for the benefit of the lawyers, and to concentrate all the business at Louisburg. As a proof that the people were in favor of the repeal of that law, he mentioned the fact that every member from Western Virginia was its advocate, except his honorable colleague who had just sat down, and he was truly representing the interests of his district, in which Louisburg was comprised.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia went into a detailed statement of the inconveniencies arising out of the passage of the former law, and was followed on the same side by Mr. CRAIG, who gave notice of some amendment he intended to move to the bill, to provide for some particular cases, as was understood, not embraced in the old act proposed to be restored by the repeal of the last.

Mr. HOPKINS described the effect of the last bill, which was to concentrate all the business of Western Virginia at Louisburg, and stated that, in the district he had the honor to represent, he did not believe there was a solitary individual who did not desire its repeal.

Mr. H. added that he had no desire to take from Louisburg the courts originally held there under the original law, nor did the bill contemplate their abolition, or the slightest interference with them, other than that of restoring them to their original condition and jurisdiction.

The same concurrence in the present bill was expressed by Mr. MORGAN and Mr. STEWART, and after some remarks in reply by Mr. BEIRNE on taking the question, the ayes were 11, noes 50; no quorum. The committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time; when,

On motion of Mr. DAVEE,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, March 10, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial from the commissioners of the Girard estate, on behalf of the city of Philadelphia, setting forth that the city of Philadelphia, under the will of the late Stephen Girard, is the owner of a large tract of land in the State of Louisiana, held under the Spanish grant, and praying Congress to pass an act authorizing the ascertainment of the validity of the title as against the United States, by proceeding in such court as Congress may select: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of E. Littel, a citizen of Philadelphia, on the subject of the currency. The petitioner, Mr. B. said, recommended an increase of the present capital of the the Philadelphia Bank of the United States thirty-five millions, making it seventy millions. He recommended that this increase be furnished by the several States, in proportion to their representation in Congress; the United States to draw drafts on the same, in sums of from five dollars up to $1,000, endorsed by the several States, to become the circulation of the country; that after the expiration of the charters of the present banks, that the capital of the bank of the United States shall be increased to one hundred and fifty millions; and afterwards an increase of two per cent. yearly. The memorial, Mr. B. said, was ably and ingeniously drawn up, but he confessed, that it had failed to produce conviction in his mind; but, as he thought it fair the petitioner should have an opportunity of conveying his sentiments to the public, he would move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. KING presented several certified statements of costs, incurred by certain merchants of Mobile, in the renewal of duty bonds; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALKER presented two memorials from the Legislature of Mississippi, one praying for the establishment of a new post route, the other for the passage of a law, granting pre-emptions to the settlers on the Choctaw purchase, both of which were appropriately referred.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of Nancy Collins.

Mr. KING, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of John Brahan; which was twice read and referred.

The following bills were severally read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading:

The bill for the relief of Isaac Bronson.

The bill for the relief of William Jones.

The bill from the House for the relief of Benjamin H. Mackall.

The bill for the relief of Irvine Shubrick.

The Senate adjourned.

PATENTS.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont moved to take up and consider the bill for the relief of John Blanc, and stated the grounds of the claim, which was for the renewal of a lost patent, but the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, presented a petition, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FLORIDA WAR.

Mr. MERCER, on leave, submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to lay before the House, at as early a day as practicable, a statement, from the latest returns, of the number and compensation of the military forces employed in Florida, and the average monthly force, and expense attending the employment thereof, in the military operations within that Territory, during the year 1837, so far as the same can be ascertained.

The resolution, under the rule, would lie over one day, and Mr. M. moved its consideration at that time.

Mr. McKAY objected, on the ground that the information called for had been already laid before the House; and the resolution lies over.

At a subsequent stage, on motion of Mr. McKAY, the resolution was agreed to.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia asked leave to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the "bill to restore circuit jurisdiction to the District Courts of the western district of Virginia."

This bill had been discussed in committee, on Saturday, between Mr. BEIRNE and the delegation from Western Virginia; the object of it was to repeal the bill of last session, which, by the construction put upon its provisions by the profession there, concentrated all the courts at Lewisburg. Mr. GARLAND now stated that all opposition to the present bill was withdrawn.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the motion.

Mr. GARLAND thereupon moved a suspension of the rule, which was agreed to, as was also the other motion, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, the above bill was read a third time, and passed.

GRANT OF LAND FOR SCHOOLS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted some time since by Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, proposing to grant a quantity of land to the old States for purposes of education, equal to that granted to the new States.

Mr. JOHNSON resumed his remarks, and went into a series of calculations to demonstrate how much each of the old States would be entitled to receive, if the same liberality, in donations of land, were extended to them as to the new States, and gave way, without concluding, to the ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Sundry bills from the Senate, lying on the Speaker's table, were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The first business in order was the motion to commit the message of the President of the United States, on the subject of the Northeastern Boundary, and the imprisonment of Mr. Greely, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; the question pending being the previous question, moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG. It was now seconded, and the main question ordered and put without a division.

So the message was committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House—

1. A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the information called for by a resolution of the House in relation to the amount of money expended for the improvement of the Missouri river.

On motion of Mr. McKIM, referred to the same Committee of the Whole as had charge of the Harbor bill.

2. A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the survey recently made of the harbor of Lynn, in the State of Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1838."

Mr. REED then moved an additional item of $52,040 for building, rebuilding, and completing light-houses in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, in addition to the sums appropriated for that purpose by the act of the 4th of March, 1838; which, after some discussion from Messrs. REED, CAMBRELENG, McKAY, DAWSON, and CUSHMAN, was disagreed to.

Mr. HOWARD moved an item of $4,500 for the outfit of a Charge d'Affaires to Peru, on the ground, he explained, that the present Charge was about to return home.

Mr. PETRIKIN opposed it, on the ground, as was understood, that these large diplomatic appropriations, by paying mere commercial agents, under the name and character of Charge d'Affaires, were a tax upon the whole community for the benefit of a single class—the merchants. Where a representative of the Government was absolutely necessary, he was in favor of it.

Mr. McKIM supported it as an indispensable appointment on account of the large exports made from the United States to that Republic, consisting chiefly of domestic produce and manufactures. Indeed he should not object to the appointment of a minister of the first grade there, for he would have more weight. It was but a short time ago that a single vessel, out of New York, had been condemned, whose cargo was worth at least a hundred thousand dollars, that might have been saved if there had been a man of influence there.

The conversation was further continued by Messrs. BELL, McKIM, PETRIKIN, MALLORY, and HOWARD, when the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to enlarge the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House from $225,000 to $273,960, so as to embrace the necessary amount to cover the expenses of the books directed to be furnished to the members of the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG raised two points of order on this amendment—

1. That there was a separate bill already before Committee of the Whole embracing this same proposed appropriation; and

2. That it was out of order to appropriate, in the bill under consideration, any money for objects for which there was no existing law.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment as sufficiently out of order on the former ground alone.

Mr. RARIDEN took an appeal on the ground that it was only an enlargement of an existing appropriation.

Mr. McKAY said that the gentleman could not obtain his object even if the amendment should be adopted, because the Clerk could not pay for these books out of the contingent fund, under the following restrictive proviso of the bill, viz: "The two sums last mentioned to be applied to the payment of the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, severally, and to no other purpose."

Mr. RARIDEN, to meet the last objection, said he would move to insert, after the word "severally," the words, "and the books ordered to be distributed to members of the House."

At the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. BELL, Mr. RARIDEN withdrew his appeal for the present, to renew it in a fuller House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG submitted an item of an additional $20,000 for the completion of the public buildings at the seat of Government of Wisconsin Territory, under the act of Congress of 1836, and caused to be read a memorial from the Legislative Council, setting forth the reasons therefor.

Mr. McKAY caused the former appropriation to be read, which appropriated the sum of $20,000 for this object.

Mr. BELL said it was a small matter to oppose, but the original appropriation was itself a departure from all former precedent, and these buildings should not have been commenced on such a scale of magnificence as would require at least twice the sum originally intended for them. Even if they appropriated $40,000, there was no security against the Territory coming here next year and asking for another $20,000.

Mr. SNYDER made another objection to the construction of these permanent buildings, viz: that the Territory would probably soon be divided, and the present location of the seat of Government would have to be moved, as it would be on or near one side of one of those divisions.

Mr. BRONSON understood the present site had been selected with a view to division; and the present seat of Government at Madison was near the centre of East Wisconsin, or Wisconsin proper, both with reference to geographical position and population. On this point the amendment was not objectionable.

Mr. BELL contended that the expense should have been limited to the original sum.

Mr. CAMBRELENG referred to the memorial of the Council, and the act of 1836, which contained no limitation or restriction.

Mr. BRONSON held that the United States were bound to construct the buildings, and bound to complete them.

Mr. McKAY differed from the gentleman, because the sum of $20,000 had been given to the Territory, and not appropriated to be expended under the direction of the officers of this Government. If the Territory commenced buildings involving an expenditure of more than that sum, they should complete them themselves.

The amendment was rejected without a division.

Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed an item of $1,200 for distributing the first volume of the Documentary History of the United States.

Mr. C. explained the objects of this appropriation, and sent to the Chair a communication from the Department on the subject, when the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL moved to strike out the following clause:

"For compensation to the clerks in said office, [Secretary of the Treasury,] per act of 23d June, 1836, $3,600."

Mr. CAMBRELENG put in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, setting forth the necessity of this extra clerk hire, on account of the increased duties of the office, and that it would be entirely impossible to conduct its business without this extra clerical force.

Mr. BELL wished the appropriation to be made specific, both as to duties, number of clerks, and compensation to each, and the exigency also set forth requiring the additional aid. It was known, also, that many of the clerks in the Departments, the Treasury in particular, were not fully occupied.

Before the question was taken, on motion of Mr. BELL, the committee rose and reported.

Mr. SAWYER, on leave, submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the construction of a light-house at Pea Island, North Carolina, which was agreed to.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. PAYNTER, on leave, presented a petition of four hundred citizens of Philadelphia, on the subject of the late duel; which was referred to the select committee on the subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD also asked leave to present several memorials on the same subject.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana objected; whereupon

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. HENRY said he had a memorial of the same import, and wished the motion to be made with reference to it also.

The CHAIR said the rule could only be suspended on the first motion.

The vote being twice taken without a quorum,

Mr. DAVEE asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 92, nays 54; not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. HOLSEY, Mr. JACKSON of Georgia, was excused from serving on the Select Committee raised on the subject of revising the laws of naturalization, on the ground that he was already a member of two committees of the House.

Resolved, That the claim of the administrator of Jacob Houne, deceased, for services rendered by said Houne in the war of the Revolution, with the proofs and exhibits, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to consider and report thereon.

LAND FOR SCHOOLS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, continued his remarks in support of his resolution to set apart a certain quantity of the public lands for purposes of education, and gave way, without concluding, to the orders of the day.

Mr. MARTIN then, on leave, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back to the House the bill to change the time of holding the Circuit Court of Alabama, &c. with an amendment in the shape of a substitute for the bill.

[It annexes Alabama to the sixth circuit.]

Mr. HAYNES said he would inquire of the Committee on the Judiciary why it was proposed so largely to increase the duties of the judge of the sixth circuit of the United States, by adding to it a State in which another judge of the Supreme Court resides? Justice to Judge Wayne required that he should make the inquiry. He did not wish to interfere with the equitable adjustment of labor between the members of the Supreme Court, but it seemed to him that the proposed change would impose an unreasonable addition of service upon the judge of the sixth circuit, and therefore he felt it his duty to inquire why it was proposed.

Mr. MARTIN and Mr. THOMPSON explained.

Mr. HAYNES replied that he did not perceive, if it was insisted that Alabama should be added to the sixth circuit, why a similar provision should not be introduced in favor of Judge Wayne to that which has been adopted in the seventh circuit, dispensing with one term of the circuit court annually in the States of Indiana and Illinois. By the proposed addition of Alabama to the sixth circuit, the travel and labor of Judge Wayne would be enormously increased, as Mobile was almost as distant from Savannah, the place of his residence, as Washington City is from Savannah, and would require of the judge almost twice as much travelling in the year as was performed in attending the annual session of the Supreme Court. He repeated that he did not desire to interfere with or disturb an equitable distribution of labor between the judges of the Supreme Court, but he did think the proposed change, by requiring the judge of the sixth circuit to preside twice a year at Mobile, would impose an unequal burden upon that officer.

Mr. THOMAS, in reply, went into a full explanation and defence of the amendment proposed, showing that its result would be to obviate the complaints which had long been made respecting the neglect of the Eastern Judicial District of Louisiana. He stated very minutely the amount of court duty performed by each of the judges, and showed that, even with the increased duty occasioned by the amendment, Judge Wayne would still have less to do than any of his brethren, Judge Barbour only excepted; while Judge McKinley would be relieved from a task too onerous to be performed by any judge. It was impracticable now to go into a general reorganization of the whole of the districts, since the time was so near when Florida, Wisconsin, and, perhaps, Ioway, would become States of the Union, that no arrangement could be made which did not look to that event; and if the districts should be so organized at this time, the plan would work unequally and unjustly in the meanwhile.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to; the bill ordered to its third reading, read a third time, and PASSED.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a message from the President, in answer to a resolution of the House, on the subject of a canal across the Isthmus of Darien; which, on motion of Mr.

FILLMORE, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Several bills from the Senate were read a first and second time, and referred to appropriate committees.

The bill ceding to the State of Ohio the interest of the United States to a certain road within that State, was read a third time, and passed.

A bill from the Senate to allow two citizens of Georgia to import iron steamboats suitable to the navigation of rivers, having been twice read,

Mr. ADAMS moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. DAWSON, that it be sent to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRAHAM, that it go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ADAMS said that he was not peculiarly favorable to the interests which might be supposed to be injured by the bill; but he considered it as virtually an attack on the compromise which had been agreed to respecting the tariff.

Mr. DAWSON said that a similar bill had come from the Senate last year, and been referred to the Committee on Manufactures, who had reported against it; he apprehended a like result now, and therefore moved the Committee on Commerce, since the bill might appropriately be sent to either.

Mr. ADAMS rejoiced to hear the principle advocated by the gentleman from Georgia, that a bill ought not be sent to a committee which was supposed to be adverse to its object. He had himself been preaching that doctrine for these three years past, but the more he preached one way, the more determined the Speaker had been in deciding the other. He hoped that when he objected to sending a measure or a memorial to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because he knew that committee to be opposed to that measure or to the object of the memorial, the principle of the gentleman from Georgia's objection would be held in remembrance.

The bill was sent to the Committee on Manufactures. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

CIVIL LIST BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government.

The question pending was on an amendment submitted by Mr. BELL, to strike out the appropriation of $3,600 for clerk hire, under the act of 23d June, 1836.

Mr. CAMBRELENG sent to the CHAIR a communication from the Treasury Department, showing the necessity for the continuance of those clerks; which communication was read by eth Clerk.

Mr. McKAY called the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact, that even if this item was struck out, these clerks would be continued under the act of 1836, because it was there provided that these clerks should be employed, and that they should be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. He himself thought there was not the same necessity for these clerks which there was before the suspension of specie payments, but the law was that they were to be continued, and until that was repealed, it was useless to make this amendment.

After a few remarks by Messrs. BELL, and Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. BELL withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an amendment, to apply the fund raised from sale of old to the purchase of new furniture for the President's House; which was agreed to.

Mr. M. MORRIS of Pennsylvania moved an amendment in the 423d line, so as to have "thirty" to read twenty, reducing the item for contingent expenses for missions abroad from thirty to twenty thousand dollars. He wished to submit a few words, in the nature of a statement, relating to one or two other parts of the bill, and explanatory of his object in making the motion.

He said that, in consequence of being placed upon the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State, it became his duty to make some inquiries upon the subject appertaining to those expenditures. One portion of his inquiry related to the appropriations and contingent expenditures for a few years past, and he had received a statement embracing the amount from the year 1829 to 1837, inclusive, of the appropriations for incidental and contingent expenses of the Department of State and for payments. It is as follows:

Years.	Appropriations.	Payments.
1829	$22,850	$24,691 44
1830	27,100	21,040 99
1831	20,000	20,213 92
1832	25,000	31,542 39
1833	25,000	28,354 14
1834	31,500	29,582 13
1835	25,000	23,437 82
1836	25,000	23,665 78
1837	25,000	23,414 05
	$226,450	$225,942 66

Making a difference in this length of time, in the aggregate, between the appropriations and the payments, of a little more than five hundred dollars. He understood that the amount of payments made in a year does not necessarily show the amount of the expenditures of that year, as there are accounts outstanding from year to year, and sometimes for several years, which, when paid, are included in the amount for the year in which the payment is made.

Another point of his inquiry was to ascertain what might be the danger or probability of misapplying or losing to the Governmen the excess of this appropriation beyond the actual expenditure. To this question he had received the following reply:

"That the balance so unexpended, except that part of it which may be in the hands of disbursing agents, remains in the Treasury, forming a part of the balance remaining therein at the end of the year; and for the portion of it that may be in the hands of disbursing agents, (with which they stand debited on the books of the Treasury,) they have to render accounts and vouchers, approved by the head of the Department, to the accounting officers of the Treasury for examination; so that the balance remaining from one year to the next cannot be misapplied or lost to the Government, being either in the Treasury or the hands of disbursing agents, and can be applied only to the object for which it was originally appropriated."

In connection with this examination, his attention had been drawn to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State to the President, in a letter dated December 2, 1837. The Secretary was asked whether there was any necessity for further legislation to secure the faithful application of the public moneys to the objects to which they were appropriated, to prevent their misapplication or embezelement, and to increase the security of the Government against losses in the disbursement thereof. He replied that, in his opinion, a stricter accountability could not be attained by further legislation; that the best security was to be derived from the character of the officers to whom the moneys were entrusted.

In relation, then, to this item for the contingent expenses of the Department of State, considering how near a correspondence there has been between the appropriations and the payments, and that, according to the opinion of the Secretary, there can be no misapplication or loss of the surplus appropriation, and that it must depend upon the fidelity and character of the disbursing officers and agents, he did not see sufficient reason to make any motion, or to insist upon a reduction of it, from that reported in the bill.

He apprehended this the chief reliance for a proper and economical use of the funds of the Government was to be had upon the honesty and energy of the officers; in that particular, he agreed in opinion with the Secretary of State. There may have been too much money expended for specific purposes; the payments heretofore made may have been extravagant, and some of the items of contingent expense in the Department, mentioned in the last report, he thought might have been dispensed with, still he was not prepared to take exception to them; they appeared to be sanctioned by usage, and if they were necessary, he would not object to the appropriation for the payment.

But, although he would agree to an appropriation adequate to the wants of the Government, yet that appropriation should be somewhat in proportion to the previous expenditures, and hence he made the motion to reduce the sum for missions abroad from thirty to twenty thousand dollars.

A reduction had been proposed by the committee reporting the bill, by the advice of the Scretary, as he understood, from thirty thousand to fifteen thousand dollars, for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse. The expenses for that purpose have heretofore exceeded that amount; but it is now thought that the sum of fifteen thousand dollars will be sufficient; so that, in that particular, a diminution is admitted to be proper by the committee.

The contingent expenses for the missions abroad for the year 1836, according to the report of the receipts and expenditures, was but $15,920 10. On the 31st of December, 1836, there was a balance of appropriation unexpended for that year of $24,587 90; and for the year 1837, there was another appropriation for this purpose of $30,000. Out of this unexpended balance, and the additional appropriation of $30,000, there was expended for and during the year 1837, a sum short of $25,000, leaving a large amount in the Treasury. He proposed this reduction to $20,000, as a medium sum, which, he apprehended, would be quite sufficient to meet all the proper demands which would be made for this purpose.

He was aware that in a bill of this description, proposing to appropriate between three and four millions of dollars, containing about a hundred and eighty items, with the power of prodigality and extravagance which disbursing agents have, if they choose to exercise it, in despite of limitation, it seems to be a matter of small importance to attempt to curtail but ten thousand dollars; but he conceived it to be proper to do so to any amount, however small, unless it appeared reasonably clear that the larger sum would be wanted for service. As an advocate for a limited and economical expenditure of the public money, and considering that the members of the House were but the agents and trustees of those who send them here, he held it to be their duty to take care of the small appropriations. Although he was not disposed at present to enter into the question of retrenchment and reform for general purposes, nevertheless he maintained that in small matters, as well as greater, it was the duty of Congress to guard the finances of the country, and to remember that the rights of control over the public treasure were only commensurate with the wants and necessities of the public service.

He had nothing further to add, but to submit his amendment to reduce the contingent expenses for missions abroad from thirty to twenty thousand dollars, which he did with a strong conviction of its propriety.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that he had made application to the department in relation to this appropriation, and has ascertained that there was a balance of only $18,000 on hand on the 1st of January, 1838, and $15,000 of that sum would be needed for the expenditure of the year 1837, not yet paid. In consequence of this, he thought this appropriation could not be reduced with safety.

The amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an additional item of $20,000 for the expenses of the Supreme and district courts of the United States.

Mr. C. explained the object of this amendment to be to defray the additional expenses, which would be increased on account of prosecutions instituted in those courts on the frontiers, and sent to the table a communication on the subject.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an additional item of $2,000 to renew the roof on the branch Mint at Charlotte, North Carolina; which was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY then moved to strike out the item of $4,000 for salaries of Cousuls of the United States at London and Paris.

Mr. McK. explained that he made this motion, because he considered that, by the rule which the House had adopted, this item was not properly introduced into this bill. The act of 1810 provided that no salary should be paid to Consuls except those to the Barbary powers; and that being the case, and there being no law to provide salaries for those officers, it was, in his opinion, improper to introduce these salaries in this bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that this was a matter which had been a very embarrassing question to the Committee of Ways and Means. In his view it was not in pursuance of law, but it had been the practice for many years to make appropriations for these officers. It would now be for the committee to determine whether these appropriations should be continued.

Mr. HOWARD called the attention of the committee to the importance of continuing these officers, and hoped the House would not strike out an appropriation of this kind, which had been inserted in this bill for a great many years.

Mr. HAYNES thought there was nothing unreasonable in this appropriation, and hoped that these agents at the great centres of the commercial world, would not be withdrawn. He considered their continuance of great importance to the commercial interests of this country, and trusted the appropriation would not be struck out.

Mr. McKAY said if these salaries were introduced and continued, it would be but a short time till you would have salaries to all our consuls introduced into your appropriation bills. If it was necessary to have salaries attached to these offices, introduce a bill to that effect; but do not attempt to give them a salary in this way, directly in the teeth of the rule of the House.

Mr. BRONSON concurred in opinion with the gentleman from North Carolina in relation to this matter, and thought that if these officers were entitled to salaries, a bill ought to be introduced to that effect. While we had a rule prohibiting the introduction into appropriation bills of new objects of appropriations, it ought to be adhered to.

After a few remarks by Messrs. MERCER, HOWARD, AUG. H. SHEPPERD, ADAMS, CAMBRELENG, and McKAY,

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with a copy of his answer to the letter of Gen. Jesup, dated Fort Jupiter, February 11, 1838, if not by him deemed improper.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. REED objected, on the ground that he wished an opportunity to call the attention of the House to some other letters from Gen. Jesup, laid on the tables this morning, and, therefore, he preferred its lying over till to-morrow.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved a suspension of the rule; but

Mr. GRENNELL moved that the House adjourn; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 14, 1838.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented the petition and papers of Thomas Coyle, of Baltimore, the patentee of the American Cement, praying the appointment of a committee to examine and prove the qualities of the cement, and, if approved by the Government, that she shall purchase the right to use it in all the public works: referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of Mrs. Snelling, widow of the late Col. Snelling, of the United States army, praying compensation for services rendered by her late husband: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a joint resolution from the Legislature of Michigan, asking an appropriation, for the purpose of making a survey of the river St. Clair, etc. referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from a large number of citizens of the city of Philadelphia, praying that a dry dock may be constructed in that city: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SPENCE presented the petition of the acting clerks in the Indian Bureau, praying increase of compensation: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Elisha Eldridge, praying remission of a certain penalty: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LYNN presented the memorial of John Rudy, of Missouri, protesting against the ratification of a certain Indian treaty, confirming Carver's grant: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS introduced a bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and establish the Territory of Ioway: read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the commissioners of the Girard estate, asking to try the validity of their claim to certain tracts of land in Louisiana, inasmuch as the case was provided for in a bill which had gone to the House of Representatives: concurred in.

Also, from the same committee, an unfavorable report on the petition of Nancy Collins; which was also concurred in.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution, intimating his intention to call it up on the succeeding day:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate of the United States, no citizen of the United States hereafter giving or accepting a challenge to fight a duel with any other citizen, or acting as second in any such duel, ought to receive or be permitted to hold any office or appointment under the Government of the United States.

Mr. FULTON, agreeably to leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Wilson W. Stephenson, J. Henderson, and Nelson Marcus; which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The following bills were severally read a third time, and passed:

Bill for the relief of George Davenport.

Bill for the relief of Michael Cassel.

Bill to repeal certain provisions of an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

Bill for the relief of Jechonias Pigot and Benjamin Lecraft, sureties of James Manney, late collector of the customs for the district of Beaufort, in the State of North Carolina; and

A bill to authorize Charles Day, of Macon, and James R. Butts, of Columbus, in the State of Georhia, to import, free of duty, two iron steamboats, suited to the navigation of rivers.

Mr. LYON then moved to take up the bill making appropriations for certain roads in Wisconsin Territory, with the view to amend the same by making an additional appropriation of $5,000, for the purpose of opening a road from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi.

This amendment was opposed by Mr. KING, on the ground that there had been no surveys or estimates on which to ground the probable cost of the road, and that it might be the mere entering-wedge for extensive appropriations from the Treasury.

Mr. WALKER opposed it on the ground that it was wrong to ask for appropriations in the present state of the Treasury, and asked if Senators were prepared to borrow money for such an occasion. Mr. W. expressed himself opposed to the whole system of internal improvements, and more particularly at this time, when the Treasury was exhausted.

The appropriation was warmly advocated by Messrs. LINN, LYON, HUBBARD, and others, on the ground that the road was to be made through the public lands, which would greatly enhance the value of the same.

Mr. HUBBARD asked for the yeas and nays on the question of the amendment, when there appeared for it 17, against it 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Tallmadge, Wall, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, and Williams—21.

Mr. LYON then moved to insert the sum of fifteen hundred dollars for the purpose of survey, on which some debate arose, when

Mr BUCHANAN said he had a very sincere desire to bring the debate on the Sub-Treasury bill to a close, and however reluctant he might feel to throw any obstacle in the way of the measure then under discussion, he should move to lay the bill on the table or pass it over informally. Mr. B. said, if he could do nothing else in the business, he should hereafter move, when the hour came for the special orders to be discussed, to move to lay all other business on the table.

Mr. LYON hoped it would be passed over informally, which was accordingly done.

The Independent Treasury Bill was then taken up; when,

Mr. ROBBINS rose, and addressed the Senate until half past two against the bill, and was followed by Mr. BENTON, who occupied the floor until five o'clock, when he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, March 15, 1838.

As soon as the House was organized this morning—

Mr. EVANS of Maine addressed the Chair in the following words:

Mr. SPEAKER: These badges of mourning which we still wear, denote that Death has lately been in the midst of us. Again his arrow has flown; and again has the fatal shaft been sent, with unerring aim, into a small, and already broken, rank. It is my melancholy office to announce that, since the last adjournment of the House of Representatives, TIMOTHY JARVIS CARTER, then one of its members, from the State of Maine, has surrendered up to the Being who gave it a life upon which many anxious hopes depended, and for whose preservation many an ardent prayer had gone up to the Father of all spirits. He died last evening, at ten o'clock, at his lodgings in this city, after a sickness of not very protracted duration, but of great and excruciating intensity of suffering and agony. The ways of a righteous Providence are inscrutable, and while we bow in submission, we are yet oppressed with deep and solemn awe.

Our deceased friend and colleague was a native of the State and the district which, so lately, he represented in this branch of Congress; and he, therefore, brought with him the confidence, largely bestowed, of those who had known him from his earliest years. Well did he deserve it. His character for probity, integrity, uprightness, morality, was free from spot or blemish. His principles were well founded. Loving the country of his birth, and its institutions, with all his heart, he pursued with fidelity such measures as his judgment deemed best calculated to promote the welfare of the one and the durability of the other. He was a lawyer by profession—faithful, just, discriminating, attentive, humane, in its practice.

Of manners mild, courteous, affable; and a temper kind, conciliating, patient, he won respect and attachment, even from those who differed with him in matters of opinion; and probably there lives not a human being who has a single resentment, or one unkind recellection, to bury in his grave. He has gone, in the strength of his manhood, and the maturity of his intellect, the road that all must once pass:

"—calcanda, semel, via lethi."

The ties that bound him to life are severed for ever, as all human ties must be severed.

"Linquenda tellus, et domus, et amans
Uxor; neque harum, quas colis, arborum
Te, præter invisas cupressos
Ulla, brevem dominum sequeter."

Although, when his eyes opened for the last time upon the earth and the sky, they fell not upon his own native hills; though the sod which shall cover him will not freshen in the same influences which clothe them in verdure and beauty; though he died far from his home, the companions and the brothers of his childhood were with him—the sharer of his joys, the solace of his griefs, stood by him; and the hand which could best do it assuaged the bitter pains of parting life. The last earthly sounds which fell upon his ear were tones of sympathy, and kindness, and affection, and support—tones which ceased not, even when they vainly strove to pierce the cold and leaden ear of death. Tears shall flow copiously, and deep sighs be heaved over his lifeless form; tears not more scalding, sighs not deeper drawn, because mingled with any bitter recollections—any unavailing regrets.

If human means could have availed—if devoted fraternal sympathy and care—if constant, abiding, self-sacrificing affection, triumphing over exhausted nature and bearing up a feeble frame, unconscious of weariness, through long and painful vigils, could have saved his life, he would long have been spared to the friends who now deplore his death, and to the State and to the country which he served. To that stricken bosom we proffer—alas! how little will it avail!—our sincere sympathy and condolence. He has gone from this place of earthly honors and human distinctions, to a seat in that "house which is not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens."

As a token of our respect for his many virtues, and of our respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I now submit.

Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of TIMOTHY J CARTER, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Maine, at 12 o'clock on Saturday.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of TIMOTHY J. CARTER, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of TIMOTHY J. CARTER, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and then the House adjourned till Saturday.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 15, 1838.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, calling for information relative to the transactions of that Department with the Metropolis Bank: laid on the table.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of King and Wilson, agents in fact for Joshua Kennedy, and the memorial of Josua Kennedy, praying confirmation of title to certain tracts of land: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WALL presented the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Warren county, New Jersey, recommending the town of Belvidere, in that county, as a suitable site for the contemplated national foundry: read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Mississippi, praying for the establishment of a new post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, on the subject of a national foundry: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had been requested, by the officers of a great Democratic meeting held in the city of Philadelphia, to present their proceedings to the Senate. He had no remarks to make on this subject, except one; and that was, that from all the accounts which he had received, he believed this was, as it had been described to be, an immense meeting; and although there was a small and respectable minority of the Democratic party of the city and county of Philadelphia opposed to the Independent Treasury bill, yet this meeting had rendered it manifest that an immense majority of that party were in its favor. He would ask that the proceedings might be read, printed, aad laid on the table.

The proceedings were then read as follows, ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

GREAT DEMOCRATIC MEETING.

City and county of Philadelphia.

An immense assemblage of the Democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in favor of the adoption of the bill for the restoration of the "Constitutional Treasury," reported in the Senate of the United States by the Hon. Silas Wright, and opposed to the instructing resolutions passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, convened in pursuance of a call made by about 2000 citizens, at the County Court-house, corner of Fifth and Chestnut streets, on Monday evening, March 12th. The meeting was organized by appointing

JOHN SNYDER, President.

Vice Presidents.

John Thompson,	Bartholomew Reese,
Jos. Worrell, sen.	Wm. H. Smith,
Isaac Wainwright,	Peter Kline,
John Rutherford, sen.	Henry Leech,
Henry Horn,	Geo. W. Smick,
George Smith,	John J. Krider,
Wm. Binder,	James Eneu, jr.
Evans Rogers,	Isaac Boileau.

Frederick Stoever, Wm. Bonsall, E. A. Penniman, } Secretaries.

The following preamble and resolutions, prepared in accordance with the instructions of a committee appointed at a preparatory meeting, were offered for the consideration of the meeting, who testified their approbation of the sentiments contained in them, by repeated applause; and they were adopted without one dissenting voice.

Whereas, By the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, Congress has power "to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." "To borrow money on the credit of the United States." "To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." "To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities, and current coin of the United States."

And whereas, By the 9th section of the same article, it is provided that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriation made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

And whereas, by the tenth section, it is also provided that "no State shall coin money," "and the nett produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States;" all of which constitutional provisions relating to the receipts and expenditures of the United States, and particularly those defining money to be coin, and giving the entire regulation of it to the National Government, show incontestibly that the only money to be received by the United States was the hard money, the metallic currency, gold and silver coin, which, in all ages and countries, has been universally recognised as money on account of its real and intrinsic value; and that there was to be an actual Treasury of the United States, into which the money was to be paid, and from which it could only be drawn and paid out in consequence of appropriations made by law.

And whereas, the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on the subject, in the emphatic language of Daniel Webster, "were HARD MONEY men; they had felt, and therefore fully appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin."

And whereas, in accordance with these views the first collection act passed 31st July, 1789, directed the duties and fees to be collected by virtue of it, to "be received in gold and silver coin only," and the act to establish the Treasury Department, passed the 2d September, 1789, made it the duty of the Treasurer to "receive and keep the moneys of the United States," and to disburse the same "in the manner pointed out by that act."

And whereas, at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the continental money of the Revolution had long before passed out of circulation, and by that noble instrument the States were prohibited from emitting bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, and no bank was contemplated by the General Government, for a provision intended to give Congress the power to create one was stricken out of the proposed Constitution, and there were but three State banks in existence in the whole country, namely, the Banks of North America, Massachusetts, and New York, whose notes or bills were never supposed to be the money meant by the Constitution, either as a legal tender, or as forming a part of the current coin of the United States, and whose vaults or safes were not mentioned in that fundamental law, as being either the Treasury of the United States, or even as component parts of it.

And whereas, in violation of the clear and express terms and spirit of the Constitution, a Bank of the United States was established which substituted its paper and that of its sisters, the State banks, for the legal currency of the country, and was followed by a temporary league with the State banks, which was succeeded by a new National Bank, under whose auspices the paper circulating medium was extended far beyond all former limits.

And whereas, not only was the legal currency of the country changed, but the vaults of National or State banks substituted for the constitutional Treasury, and the money of the people, instead of remaining in the care of their agents, was loaned out to the favorites of these great corporate bodies in direct defiance of the words and spirit of the Constitution.

And whereas, the people of the United States having solemnly decided a second time, after a full and dispassionate examination of the whole question, that a National Bank was "unconstitutional, inexpedient, and dangerous," another temporary league was formed with the State institutions, which was dissolved forever in May last, by their voluntary declaration that they would not, and could not, fulfil the terms of their contract.

And whereas, this event has produced an entire separation of Bank from State, and has placed the nation in a position to restore the true meaning of the Constitution, and with it the constitutional Treasury contemplated by its framers, without the slightest injustice or injury to any class or body of individuals, and it is the clear interest of the people that their revenues should be collected, received, kept and disbursed by their own officers, who are directly responsible to them for all their acts. Therefore,

Resolved, That this meeting does most cordially approve the special and annual messages of the President, proposing the restoration of the constitutional Treasury, and the entire and total separation forever of Bank and State, and of the bill reported by the Hon. Silas Wright in the Senate, in pursuance of this recommendation.

Resolved, That this cardinal measure of Democratic policy has received the cordial and united support of the Democracy of Pennsylvania, who are firmly determined never to submit to the government of irresponsible corporate bodies, whether State or National, foreign or domestic, or to the domination of an upstart moneyed aristocracy.

Resolved, That a Bank of the United States is "unconstitutional, inexpedient, and dangerous," and will never be tolerated by the freemen of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a proposition to connect the Government with twenty-five banks, by a solemn league and a covenant, is in effect to select the miscalled Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, which owes its existence to a direct violation of the will of the people of this great State, with its branches and agencies, and purchased and dependent banks, as the depositories of the money of the United States, and is only the first step towards a recharter ef it as a national institution, which had expired amidst the execrations of an outraged community.

Resolved, That the resolutions passed at Harrisburg, in relation to the bill reported by the honorable Silas Wright, to restore the constitutional Treasury, were in open violation of the will of the Democratic party of this State, and of a majority of the people of Pennsylvania, and were carried by the votes of a few Democrats, who must answer to their constituents for their entire disregard of their wishes, and the betrayal of the confidence reposed in them.

Resolved, That the Democratic members of the county of Philadelphia who voted against the instructing resolutions at Harrisburg, deserve our cordial and hearty approbation.

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, attested by the officers of this meeting, be transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, and also to the Hon. James Buchanan and the Hon. Lemuel Paynter, with a request that they will lay them before the two houses of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking Congress to establish a dry dock at the navy yard at that place: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MERRICK presented the petition of William A. Weaver, and others, of the city of Washington, praying Congress to encourage the cultivation of the mulberry, and the rearing of silk worms: referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

DEATH OF THE HON. T. J. CARTER.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, announcing the death of the Hon. TIMOTHY JARVIS CARTER, late a member of that House from the State of Maine, and that his funeral would take place from the hall of that House at 12 o'clock, m. on Saturday next.

After the reading of the message, Mr. RUGGLES addressed the Senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: The message from the House of Representatives, just read, communicating the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Hon. TIMOTHY J. CARTER, a Representative from the State of Maine, imposes on me the duty, which I cannot perform without the deepest emotion, of moving the customary resolutions of respect for the memory of the deceased. He died last evening at the hour of ten, at his lodgings in this city, after much severe but patient suffering—at peace with all, at variance with none.

I know that occasions of this kind have usually been improved to pronounce eulogies on the characters of deceased members; but the painful emotions which have been awakened by the last sad adieu of an esteemed friend and colleague, but poorly qualify me to speak at this time, and in this place, of his manly virtues, his purity of heart, the engaging mildness of his disposition, the unusual excellence of the character he maintained in all his domestic and social relations. It is but to say, what all who knew him as I have known him would say, that his whole life afforded constant exemplification of the strictest moral rectitude, in the upright, faithful, conscientious performance of every duty connected with his station in society.

Though yet scarcely past the morning of life, he had received many gratifying proofs of the estimation in which his talents and probity were held by the people and the councils of his State.

As a representative, he has been devotedly faithful to his trust, and fully justified the confidence reposed in his virtue and patriotism. He sought not high political distinction. He was unambitious of renown, but guided his footsteps by that calm and steady light which shines all along the pathway of duty and usefulness.

He inherited his virtue from a highly respectable parentage, and has left a wide circle of attached relatives and friends to mourn his exit; three of whom, under the ready impulses of fraternal affection, obeyed the earliest summons to his sick bed. Alas! it was but to witness, with poignant grief, the closing scene in the brief drama of human existence.

He was a husband and a father; but how can I presume here to speak of the agonized feelings of her, who, whilst she caught his latest sigh, felt that as in life, so almost also in death, his destinies were her own!

With the deceased, life's fleeting shadow has passed by, and eternity has opened its broad portals. Nothing now remains but the tears of relatives, the regrets and sympathies of friends, and the moral influence of his example for all.

The usual resolutions were then adopted, that the Senate would attend the funeral of the late Mr. CARTER, and go into mourning, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The Senate adjourned over to Saturday next.

The resolutions were read as follows:

1. Resolved, That the power of removing executive officers is vested in the President of the United States.

2. Resolved, That this power was conferred to enable the Executive "to take care that the laws are faithfully executed," and cannot be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, without an abuse of power, tyrannical in its operations, corrupting in its tendency, and converting a remedy for unworthiness and misconduct into a terrible engine of Executive power.

3. Resolved, That the patronage of the Executive Department has increased to an alarming extent, and ought to be restricted and diminished so far as is compatible with a safe and faithful execution of the laws.

4. Resolved, That it is the right of the Representatives of the people to examine into all abuses and usurpations which may be apprehended to exist in any of the Executive Departments, in order that they may be corrected and prevented, if possible, by legislation; and, in flagrant and wanton cases, exposed and punished.

5. Resolved, That the power of appointment and removal from office, vested in the Executive, may be greatly abused, and its exercise ought, therefore, to be watched and strictly guarded, so as, if possible, "to prevent the power and patronage of the Executive from being brought into conflict with the freedom and purity of elections."

6. Resolved, That the Representatives of the people in this House have a right to inquire into the causes for which any Executive officer has been dismissed from office by the Executive.

7. Resolved, That, in prosecuting such inquiry, the House of Representatives has a right to call for and have furnished to it all official documents, papers, and letters, relating to the removal of such officer, which may be on file among the records of any of the Executive departments.

8. Resolved, That a select committee of members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether any "honest, capable, and faithful" officers have been dismissed from office, not on grounds of error, negligence, incapacity, misconduct, or unfitness; and, also, to consider and report whether any and what restrictions can be imposed by law upon Executive patronage, so as more effectually to guard against abuse and corruption in the exercise of the power of removal from and appointment to office.

Mr. PATTON asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend, which were ordered.

Mr. B. said that the accompanying documents were very strong, and he would move to refer them, with the petition, to the Committee on the Judiciary, trusting that that committee would give all the necessary attention to the subject: the motion was carried.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of Horace Binney and sundry other citizens of Philadelphia, in which they state that a large amount of property is invested in the bookselling business, and asking an investigation for the purpose of convincing Congress that great injury and injustice would result from the passage of the international copy-right bill.

Mr. B. said that he would, at a proper time, move for the appointment of a select committee on the subject: the memorial was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented a joint resolution of that State, recommending a site at or near Hausin, Indiana, on the White Water Canal, as a suitable location for a national armory, and instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to use their exertions to procure an examination of that point, with a view to locate an armory there, or some other eligible site within the State: laid on the table and ordered to be printed, a bill having been reported generally on the subject.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for the charter of a National Bank, and opposed to the Independent Treasury bill, in any form. The petitioners say they are also opposed to the amendment submitted by Mr. RIVES, regarding it as what they term one of the unfortunate family of experiments: laid on the table.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the Senate bill to change the times of holding the courts of the United States for the ninth circuit, together with the amendments of the House thereto, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the petition of James L. White, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEVIER, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause patents to be issued to the persons, and for the lands therein mentioned, reported the same without amendment, and recommending the rejection of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to recommit the bill, with certain additional documents.

Mr. SEVIER opposed the motion; and, after some remarks from Messrs. LINN and KING, Mr. SMITH's motion was lost.

The report was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON presented the petition of H. W. Williams, of Charleston, S. C. which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following resolutions were submitted:

By Mr. MORRIS:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether the present laws of the United States on the subject of the slave trade will prohibit that trade being carried on between the citizens of the United States and the citizens of the Republic of Texas, whether by land or by sea; and whether it would be lawful in vessels owned by citizens of that Republic, and not lawful in vessels owned by citizens of this, or lawful in both, and by citizens of both countries; and also whether a slave carried from the United States into a foreign country, and brought back or returning into the United States, is considered a free person, or is liable to be sent back, if demanded, as a slave, into that country from which he or she in part came; and also whether any additional legislation by Congress is necessary on any of these subjects. Lies over one day.

By Mr. YOUNG:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Fayette post office, in Green county, in the State of Illinois, by way of Oceola and Waverley, to Springfield, in that State: adopted.

Also, of a route from Columbus, Mississippi, by Waverley, or Millin's Bluff, in Lowndes county, to Colbert, in the same county: adopted.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the Senate took up the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate, to change the times of holding the courts of the United States for the 9th circuit; and after a few remarks from Mesers. CLAY of Alabama, GRUNDY, SEVIER, and LUMPKIN, the hour of one o'clock having arrived, the subject was passed over informally.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury Bill; when

Mr. BENTON resumed his remarks, commenced on Thursday last, and addressed the Senate until past 4 o'clock; when,

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD,

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont asked leave to move to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the "bill for the relief of John Blank," with a view to bring it into the House.

Mr. REID objected.

DISTRIBUTION OF LANDS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland then resumed his remarks in support of his resolution to grant lands to the old States for school purposes.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and Deplomatic expenditures of the Government."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. McKAY to strike out the the appropriations for Consuls at London and Paris; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to increase the item for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $10,000, and sent to the Chair communications from the department on the subject.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if there had been any examination into the disbursement of this fund, because he feared this item had not been properly expended.

Mr. CAMBRELRNG replied, that the chairman of the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of the State would be the most proper person to answer this inquiry. Mr. C. then made some remarks in support of the amendment he had submitted.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD went into an explanation of the manner in which these disbursements were made, and expressed himself as not being satisfied with the manner in which these disbursements were made.

Mr. HOWARD supported the amendment on the ground that exchange was at a higher rate than heretofore.

Mr. PHILLIPS went into a full explanation as to the manner of disbursing this fund, and urged the increase of it on the House because of the increased tonnage of the country, and the increased demands which were made upon it on account of the number of desertions and discharges of our seamen in foreign ports.

After a few remarks by Messrs. ADAMS, SHEPPERD, CAMBRELENG, HOWARD, McKAY, REED, PHILLIPS, and McKIM, the question was taken, and the vote was, ayes 49, noes 17—no quorum.

The committee then rose, and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. REED moved that the House adjourn, with a view, he said, of obtaining a quorum, while the yeas and nays would be taking on the motion.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 9, nays 121.

So the House refused to adjourn, and a quorum appearing, the chairman resumed the chair, in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment pending was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an item of $4000 for the second payment of Mr. Persico, for statues for the Capitol, and another of $8000 for the second payment for the paintings in the rotundo: agreed to.

Mr. BELL then submitted the following amendment.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of October next, the salaries of all the officers for the payment of which provision is made in this act, and all compensations and allowances to agents or other persons authorized by law, the payment of which is provided for in this act, except the President and judges of the courts of the United States, and except, also, such officers, agents, diplomatic or commercial, whose duties require them to reside without the limits of the United States and the Territories thereof, shall be reduced one-fourth, or twenty-five per cent. of the amount now authorized by law: Provided, That any time before the said first day of October, the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to the House of Representatives, entitled "A bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," or any other bill of a similar tendency, or in which provision shall be made for the collection and disbursement of the public revenue in gold and silver, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt issued under the authority of the United States, to the exclusion of current bank notes, shall become the law of the land.

Mr. CAMBRELENG raised the question of order on this amendment.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order under the 43d rule, which sets forth that "no motion or proposition, on a subject different from that under consideration, shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Mr. BELL addressed the committee at some length, to show that this amendment did not fall within the operation of that rule, and that precedent admitted this amendment to be in order; for a similar proposition had been several times discussed, on a motion to amend the same bill, for days and weeks, made by the present Governor Vance of Ohio.

The appeal was also sustained in a few words by Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, if the gentlemen from Tennessee and North Carolina would refer back, they might find fifty cases where the validity of the rules had been abolished by the House and the Senate; and in consequence of this, a discussion had been kept up for weeks and months on matters which had no legitimate relation to the appropriation bills with which they were connected. We have a new rule designed to prevent the introduction into the appropriation bills of any subject not provided for by law; and it was in consequence of this rule that he objected to this amendment. But suppose the decision of the Chair to be overruled by the House, and he should take the converse of this proposition, and move it as an amendment; suppose he should move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, by moving to increase the salaries of all officers of Government, in case a certain bill did not pass, would gentlemen agree that that would be in order? If the one was in order, certainly the other would be. He held this amendment to be utterly contrary to the spirit of all the rules of the House, and hoped the decision of the Chair would be sustained. If this amendment was introduced, we would be kept here debating this bill perhaps for months to come, while the public service would be suffering for want of the appropriations contained in this bill. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment would be rejected, and that the bill would be speedily passed.

After a few remarks by Messrs. BELL, HALSTED, REED, and CUSHMAN, the decision of the Chair was affirmed—ayes 66, noes 57.

Mr. REED then rose and said his attention had been called to a report of some remarks made by him some days ago, by the Globe, as to the Postmaster General. Justice to the Postmaster General and himself required him to say that the reporter had mistaken his remarks.

I remarked, said Mr. R. upon the subject of advertising for contracts, and also upon the subject of postmasters' taxes on boxes, debated in this House two years ago; and also to a call made early in the session for a reduction of the postage; when the chairman [Mr. MONTGOMERY] said he presumed the gentleman [Mr. REED] could get all the information he desired by a call upon the Departmeht. Upon that occasion, Mr. R. replied that he had made repeated calls, meaning by resolutions, etc. and in debate, and referring to the boxes and the reduction of the postage, but did not refer to any formal call upon the Department; nor did he refer at that time, at all, to the expense of advertising.

Mr. HALSTEAD then moved to strike out the item of $4,000 for a jet d'eau on the south side of the central foot-way, in front of the Capitol.

Mr. H. intimated his intention of making some remarks on this subject, but gave way to

Mr. MALLORY, on whose motion the committee rose.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

Mr. JENIFER asked leave to submit a motion to print 5,000 extra copies of the President's Message and accompanying documents in relation to the tobacco tade; which was granted, the motion put and agreed to.

Mr. J. moved to recommit the bill to incorporate certain banks of the District of Columbia to the Committee on the District; which was agreed to.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 20, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented the proceedings of a large meeting of the friends of the late and present Administrations of the General Government, but opposed to the bill in the United States Senate, reported by the honorable SILAS WRIGHT, commonly called the Sub-Treasury, recently assembled at Pittsburg; on which occasion George A. Cook presided.

Mr. McK. said, on looking over the names of the gentlemen who made the call, and took part in this meeting, he knew many of them to be what they professed to be, "friends and supporters of the late and present Administrations; he knew, furthermore, that that they were men of respectability, and Democrats of the Jeffersonian school: read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. also reported a bill for the relief of the town of Southport, Wisconsin, and a bill for the relief of Alvarez Fisk, and the legal representatives of Thomas P. Eskridge; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, also reported, without amendment, the bill from the House to cede to the State of Ohio the interest of the United States to a certain road in that State.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill to divide the Territory of Wisconsin, and establish the Territory of Ioway, reported the same, with an amendment, which was read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MORRIS yesterday, relative to the transfer of slaves from the United States to Texas, came up for consideration.

Mr. WALKER moved to lay it on the table; when

Mr. MORRIS calling for the yeas and nays, they were ordered, and the question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Lyon, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith of Indiana, Swift, and Williams—9.

The bill for the relief of Michael Cassel was read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to change the times of holding the courts of the United States in the ninth circuit, together with the amendments of the House thereto.

Mr. SEVIER moved to amend the amendment, by changing the times of holding the circuit in Arkansas, from the third Monday of March to the first Monday of October; which amendment was adopted.

Mr. SEVIER submitted a further amendment as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That if any of the judges of the circuit courts of the United States shall fail or refuse to hold any court belonging to the circuit or district, which had been assigned him by law, unless prevented by sickness, such judge shall be considered guilty of a high misdemeanor."

Mr. SEVIER said he thought it his duty to endeavor, in some way or other, to see that courts were held in his State. We had no circuit court last spring in Arkansas: we shall have no court there this spring. I had intended to offer an amendment to this bill, to deduct one thousand dollars from the salary of the judge for every court he failed or refused to hold. But, upon reflection, I thought such an amendment could not be adopted consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, and, on that account alone, I had not offered it. The only remedy I know of, is the one I have proposed. I know that, in raising my voice against the immaculability of the judges, I shall raise up against me a strong opposition. The Judiciary is the favorite branch of the Government. But such a consideration shall not prevent me from doing what I conceive my duty on this or any other important subject. So far as I am concerned, if the judges do not hold their courts, and discharge the duties of their high offices, I shall, for one, endeavor to make them.

Mr. PRESTON suggested that the laws were already sufficient to provide against nonfeasance as well as malfeasance in office, and that a judge, guilty of either, was liable to impeachment and conviction. Without intending to express any opinion as to the present case, he thought that an impeachment here would do more towards securing fidelity in the public officers, than any affirmation in the statute book.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, in reply, that the censure which seemed to be implied in the last remarks of the Senator from Arkansas, as an act of justice to the present judge of the ninth circuit, demanded some explanation. So far as any thing like neglect of duty was imputed to the judge, those remarks were founded in mistake. He said the present judge did not receive his commission until the month of May last, and after the time appointed for holding the circuit court of Arkansas of the last year had passed by. If the bill under consideration had passed as it left the Senate, the time of the court would have been fixed for the third Monday of March; and we all know the Supreme Court had adjourned at too late a period for the judge to have reached Little Rock in time, without abandoning his seat and neglecting the performance of his duty here. Hence the Senator from Arkansas had no right, thus far, to complain of the present incumbent.

Mr. C. also said, that at the times appointed for holding the courts in New Orleans and Mobile last fall, it was well known the yellow fever was prevailing in both those places, and it would have been madness for the judge to have gone there. Indeed, if he had gone, Mr. C. said, he could have done nothing, for the parties, witnesses, and jurors, could not have been induced to attend; so that, as regarded the circuit at large, Mr. C. said there had been no neglect of duty on the part of the judge.

Mr. C. said he was no apologist for any public officer who might be guilty of a neglect of duty, but he felt himself bound to do justice to all when wrongfully charged. He still thought the Senator from Arkansas had better withdraw his amendment; its object was sufficiently embraced by the general doctrine already adverted to in this debate, and there was danger of weakening, rather than strengthening, that doctrine, by such specifications as the amendment proposed.

Mr. SEVIER then, at the suggestion of Mr. C. withdrew his amendment,

Mr. PRESTON suggesting that he had an amendment to offer; but the hour of one o'clock having arrived, the subject was passed over informally, and

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, when Mr. SOUTHARD, who had the floor, addressed the Chair in opposition to the bil, and continued his speech until a late hour, when he gave way for a motion to go into executive business; and then, after a short session,

The Senate adjourned.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, but the other disagreed to.

And, also, what steps have been taken by him to obtain satisfaction from the Government of Great Britain on account of said outrages. And to communicate to the House any correspondence relative thereto, which has passed between the Government of the United States and Great Britain, or any of the public authorities of either.

Mr. McKIM said, that seeing the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HOWARD] was not in his seat, he moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped the gentleman would not press that motion, for his belief was that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was not opposed to it.

Mr. McKIM could not withdraw the motion, for he believed the Executive was doing every thing in his power to bring the matter to a satisfactory issue, and the effect of this resolution would be rather to impede than facilitate that object.

Mr. FILLMORE then said he must be compelled to ask for the yeas and nays; but, before they were ordered,

Mr. McKIM varied his motion, by moving to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till to-morrow.

Mr. FILLMORE said that, if the gentleman would assign some good reason for that motion, he would not object to it.

Mr. McKIM replied that he had made the motion for the same reason he had made the other.

Mr. FILLMORE rejoined that if he had not good reason to believe that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was not opposed to the resolution, he would assent to this motion, but believing otherwise, he could not.

Mr. McKIM was decidedly opposed to the resolution, for he was sensible that the two Governments were doing every thing in their power to bring the question to a satisfactory issue, and this would only tend, if it had any effect at all, to widen the breach. In proper time all the information would be laid before them.

Mr. FILLMORE wanted it now, because he and his constituents felt a deep interest in the matter, and they had no apprehensions that the disclosures of the truth would have a dangerous tendency. Still, if any danger was to be apprehended therefrom, it would be in the power of the Executive to withhold the information. Mr. F. was so far willing to confide in the discretion of the Executive, and surely the gentleman from Maryland was not less so.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that the gentleman would withdraw the motion. Mr. A. then alluded to the three letters in the National Intelligencer of this morning, between the British Minister and Secretary Forsyth, communicated by Governor Head to the Legislature of Upper Canada, and commented upon the extraordinary circumstance of the American Congress deriving its earliest knowledge of those documents through so distant and foreign a source, when it ought long since to have come in directly.

Mr. McKIM would, with pleasure, accede to the gentleman's wish, if he could do so consistently with what he held to be right and proper.

Mr. McK. had seen the correspondence alluded to, and regretted its publication as out of time. As the gentleman, however, had adverted to it, he would draw his attention to one point in the letter of the British minister, viz: that the whole affair had been transferred to London, and this presented an additional reason against further agitating the question at this time. It was premature, and could do nothing but embarrass the negotiation between the two countries.

Mr. FILLMORE again resisted the motion, and gave, as an additional reason, that the information might be indispensable in case it should be deemed expedient to arm the frontier.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont hoped the subject would not be postponed. The district represented by him bordered on Canada to the extent of half way across Vermont, and this outrage had produced a great excitement among the people there. Three months had now been suffered to pass, and all the information we had was furnished through the Canada press, while not the least had come from our own Government. The citizens of that section wished to know if our Government was sleeping upon it or not, and Mr. F. was of opinion that, if the answer to the call contained such information as it ought, it would greatly tend to quiet the excitement. He hoped the House would adopt the resolution, and suffer the information to go before the people.

The motion to postpone was then put and lost, and the resolution was agreed to.

Sundry bills from the Senate were then taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CASEY in the Chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government for the year 1838."

The question pending was the motion made on yesterday by Mr. HALSTEAD, to strike out the item of $4,000 for a jet d'eau on the south side of the centre footway in front of the Capitol.

Mr. HALSTEAD had no objection to making appropriations for improving and ornamenting the public grounds at a proper season; but at a time like the present, when our finances were in a most deranged condition, he thought to make an appropropriation of this kind when there was no immediate necessity for it, might subject us to the charge of extravagance. It was a matter which might well be postponed; and he thought a Democratic economical Administration ought to oppose such extravagance as this, especially when we are borrowing millions of dollars, in the shape of Treasury notes, for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Government. If this apprpriation had been found in an appropriation under the late administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, across the way, [Mr. ADAMS,] a great outcry would have been made about it. We all know the cry that was raised, during that Administration, about the east room, the billiard table, etc. Then let the present Administration practise upon the principles which it laid down before it came into power. He was opposed to all appropriations of this kind, which could be dispensed with without doing any injury to the public service.

Mr. H. addressed the House about two hours, contrasting the whole of the expenditures of the present Administration with the expenditures of the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and comparing the principles of Democracy, as laid down by Thomas Jefferson, with the principles held by the party now in power, with a view of showing that the expenditures of the Government exceeded what they had formerly, and that the principles of Democracy of the present time were very different from the principles entertained by Mr. Jefferson, and commenting with much severity upon the course of many of the Executive officers.

Mr. BYNUM was at loss to express his feelings with regard to the course of argument which had been pursued by the gentleman from New Jersey. He was surprised to find that any gentleman would pursue such a course of remarks, after the scenes which we have had arising from debates of this kind; and he trusted, if gentlemen did not want to involve the House in disgraceful scenes, that he would cease to pursue such a course of remarks. He regretted to see these Halls, which should alone be used for the purpose of doing the business of the people, converted into an arena for the promulgation of filthy electioneering slang. He had hoped from the scenes which have passed before us, that debates of this kind would have been put an end to in the Hall of the House of Representatives of the nation. Every intelligent member of the party to which the New Jersey member was connected, had the same feeling, with regard to the remarks of the gentleman, which he [Mr. B.] entertained, and he could only account for this singular speech by the gentleman's own admission, that he was a novice in matters of legislation; that, he considered, was the only excuse which the gentleman had for making such a speech on such an occasion. The cause of such appeals as these being made to the country, could only be found in the fact that there was a dread of the ruling hand of the people. Their power at the ballot-boxes was dreaded; and gentlemen made this place a political lecture room, for the purpose of promoting their party slang and abuse, to endeavor to mislead the popular voice of the country; but the people of the country, who were cool and calm, and from from the excitement which might be got up here, would appreciate these harangues properly, especially as they come from a gentleman who acknowledged himself to be a novice. If the gentleman from New Jersey had consulted the older and more experienced members of his party, for many of whom he [Mr. B.] entertained the highest respect, he would never have made such a haraugue as the one he had just concluded. They would have told him that such attempts were not the more fruitful. He must, therefore, look upon the gentleman from New Jersey as not reflecting the opinions of the party with which he claimed to act. In fact, he had heard the opinion of many honorable and high-minded men with regard to the speech which the gentleman had delivered, and it was entirely disapproved of by many of them. He would not here attempt a vindication of the Executive Departments of the Government upon a trifling appropriation for a fountain in front of the Capitol, because, unfortunately for the gentleman from New Jersey, on this occasion, the head of the committee which reported this appropriation originally, and who urged it upon the Committee of Ways and Means and the House, was a distinguished member of the party to which the gentleman belonged. He alluded to Mr. LINCOLN, who was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and certainly that gentleman would never assent to any appropriation which was extraordinary or extravagant.

The House would recollect that the gentleman from New Jersey, who had just addressed the House, had on a former occasion, at the extra session, made a speech in most classic style, on which occasion he believed he had read a great part of the book of Horace, and he must say that his remarks of to-day ill comported with his remarks on that occasion. He had to-day designated the party opposed to him in politics as "Van Jacks," and made allusions to "darkeys" and "blackeys," which would do him but little credit in the House and out of it, and which but little comported with the oft-repeated assertion that his party was composed of all the talents and all the decency. He trusted the matter would end here, but he would say to the gentleman that he occupied a responsible situation, when he used such slang as this. He did not believe, however, that the gentleman had intended the speech for the House of Representatives of the nation, but merely for home consumption—for the use of his constitutents. Then, if this was the case, he would recommend the gentleman to address them in a manner either at home, or through some other medium, which would not be consuming the public time and public money. The gentleman's speech had cost the people and the country more than the amount of the whole appropriation, which he proposed to strike out; and he believed if his constituents were the intelligent citizens, which he [Mr. B.] took them to be, that it would operate more against the gentleman himself than those against whom it was directed. The gentleman had gone on to say that there were many appropriations for the public service which ought to be reduced. If this was the case, that the expenditures of Government were extravagant, let the gentleman introduce a proposition to reduce them, separate and apart from this bill, and he would go for it. Mr. B. had no doubt, however, but that the gentleman from New Jersey would hold on to the prolific mother of all these extravagant expenditures—the tariff.

If he (Mr. B.) was going to curtail expenditures, he should consider that the first blow ought to be struck at a high tariff; and, if this was done, where would the gentleman from New Jersey be found? He would doubtless be found opposing it. With regard to the vituperative slang of the gentleman against the late President Jackson, he thought it ill befitting a member of the House of Representatives, and it only showed the malignant hatred which the gentleman entertained for the Demos cratia—the ruling people of this land. Because they had honored the late President, the gentleman from New Jersey denounces him. Mr. B. addressed the House at considerable length, and with some warmth, in reply to the various assertions and charges of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LINCOLN opposed the amendment, and remarked upon the extraordinary course of Mr. HALSTEAD in making a general attack upon the Administration, and delaying the passage of this important bill, on a little item like the one under consideration; an item inserted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at Mr. L's instance. He severely reprehended these indiscriminate censures and abuse of the Administration, in which he never would join, and which he believed had lost much of the influence among the people that the party with which he acted would otherwise have enjoyed; and he was aware of the responsibility he assumed in making this declaration. Mr. L. then went on to support the proposed appropriation with much earnestness, in repy to Mr. H. and insisted that there was not a constituent of the gentleman who would not blush at the work being rejected, after being acquainted with the circumstances. There was not the shadow of an apology to reject it. The gentleman had complained of other appropriations as not being consistent with the Jeffersonian Democratic Republican Jacksonian doctrine, but whatever it was, they should have Mr. L's support. With reference to the President's Mansion, about the costliness of which the gentleman had complained so much, it was a disgrace to the country; and in many of the rooms the gentleman would not lodge his negro, if he kept one. Mr. L. had not a constituent who voted for him whose rooms were not better furnished than that in which the President received company of both sexes. The roof and wings of the building leaked, and yet the gentleman from New Jersey would withhold the appropriation to put it in repair, to stop the leaks. Mr. L. would not hesitate to empanel a jury of the gentleman's constituents on the question; and he hesitated not to say that they would not sustain him.

Mr. BELL returned his thanks to the gentleman from New Jersey, for the course he had pursued in bringing the abuses of the Government to the notice of the country, expressed his regret at the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and went into somewhat an extended explanation of Mr. HALSTEAD's remarks. Mr. B. said it was the duty of those who believed abuses to exist to expose them, and they must avail themselves of every opportunity to do so, for whatever appropriation bill came up, its speedy passage would be urged on the ground of want of money.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the gentleman had correctly stated that the cry would be, on every appropriation bill, that the money was wanted. They were then in the fourth month of the session, and there was not one single department of the Government that, for the last two or three months, had not been absolutely at the mercy of every broker, bank and shaver in the couutry. By the indulgence of the Speaker alone had the members of Congress been saved; but Mr. C. could tell gentlemen that even that indulgence was about to fail, and they would soon be in the situation of the Government officers throughout the Union. Mr. C. hoped this bill would be brought out of committee to-night, especially as there were so many important bills behind upon which they could debate these questions, for upwards of half a million of protested drafts upon the Government were already lying over. Mr. C. did not regret these speeches being made at the proper time, for they were always productive of good, but he begged gentlemen who had them in preparation to reserve them to another occasion, which would soon present itself.

After a few remarks from Mr. MERCER, Mr. HALSTEAD obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. BELL, on whose motion the committee rose and reported.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, on leave, laid on the table, with a view of having it printed and offering it on the next resolution day, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of —— members be appointed, to take into consideration the propriety of proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States, in incorporating banks, or other associate bodies, from authorizing the issue of notes of the same denominations of the coin of the United States, or under.

On motion,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 21, 1838.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. ABRAHAM VAN BUREN, his private Secretary; which was read:

To the Senate of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the Senate of the United State, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a copy of the correspondence requested by their resolution of the 5th ultimo.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1838.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the message with the accompanying documents was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of sundry citizens af New York, on the subject of the late duel: laid on the table and printed.

On motion of Mr. CUTHBERT, the petition and papers of Commodore Warrington, on the files of the last session, were again referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of sundry citizens of Buffalo, New York, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the harbor of Silver Creek: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of eleven citizens of Philadelphia, protesting against the annexation of Texas to the Union: laid on the table.

Mr. B. presented two petitions, one signed by fourteen, the other by forty-one citizens of Philadelphia county, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. The question whether these petitions should be received, was laid on the table.

Mr. LINN said when he moved, some days since, for the printing of the report and accompanying documents in relation to the introduction and cultivation of tropical plants in Florida, he wished to have had a number of additional copies printed. Finding that it would be inconvenient to the publishers to keep the types standing, he would now move that 5,000 additional copies be printed at once.

Mr. BUCHANAN would like some explanation before he could consent to vote for the printing of so large a number of the documents in question.

Mr. LINN explained at large that the whole subject was one of vital interest to Florida, as well as of vast importance in a national point of view. Mr. L. was well convinced, from what he had already seen, that the introduction and cultivation of these plants would be attended with the most beneficial results to the whole country. The documents abounded with the most interesting information to the scientific agriculturalist, and might be the means of opening a wide field, in this country, for the introduction of plants, that could be converted into uses for the Government, while they would be advantageous to the citizen. Mr. L. said the documents would speak for themselves.

The question was taken, and the printing was ordered by a large majority.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, made unfavorable reports on the bills from the House for the relief of George Dyer and Squire Stearns.

The bill to change the times of holding the courts of the United States in the 9th circuit, was taken up; and the question being on the amendment of the House—

Mr. PRESTON said he was opposed to the amendment offered by the House of Representatives, because it would have a tendency to diminish the duties of the judge of the 9th district, and increase those of the judge of South Caralina and Georgia, who in the case before the Senate, Mr. P. said might be viewed somewhat in the light of a constituent. These judges, he said, were of recent appointment, and had entered upon their duties with a full knowledge of all the labors and responsibilities attached to the station.

It was well known that Judge Wayne had performed the duties of his office to the satisfaction of every body; and hence he, Mr. P. objected to the additional labors which the amendment would necessarily impose on him. Besides, if he recollected aright, it was made ground of complaint the other day by a Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] that the judge had not yet performed the duties of his office; and yet here was a proposition before them to make a change before we could tell how the system would be likely to work.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the Senator from South Carolina seemed to make it a personal, rather than a public, concern. If the Senator would look at the subject with his usual care, he would perceive that the change would be attended with great public convenience. It was not a question of taking from one and giving to another, but so to equalize the duties as to insure their performance to the satisfaction of the public. As the arrangement now stood, it was utterly impracticable for the judge of the ninth district to get through the labors of the office. Mr. C. then went into a long detail to show the extent of travel incident to this circuit, and contrasted it with that of the judge of the sixth judicial district. While Judge McKinley's circuit embraced an extent of upwards of six thousand five hundred miles, Judge Wayne's did not exceed thirty-six hundred.

Mr. WHITE spoke for some time in relation to the adoption of the present judicial system, and the object that was had in view in its original arrangement. He would prefer that the whole matter should stand as it does until the next session. Mr. W. took occasion to express his regret at the attempt to introduce as ystem of mileage for the judges, and he was pleased to see that the committee had asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. If the salaries of the judges are not sufficient, [said Mr. W.] raise them, but do not establish a system alike at war with former usages, and the dignity of the station.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that as this bill would probably take up some time in discussion, and as it was near the hour for the special orders of the day to be taken up, he should move to lay it on the table, or pass it over informally.

The bill was then passed over informally, Mr. PRESTON intimating his intention, when it came up again, to move to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, when Mr. SOUTHARD resumed his argument, in opposition to the bill, and continued speaking till after three o'clock.

The question was then taken on Mr. RIVES'S amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

Mr. PRESTON, after the result of the vote was announced, came into the Senate Chamber, and asked permission to record his vote in favor of the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT said, if there was no objection made, he should direct the Secretary to record the name.

Mr. BENTON objected. He had been there eighteen years, and had uniformly opposed every motion of that kind. He thought it established a bad precedent to permit Senators to record their names after the vote had been taken, and the result made known.

Mr. GRUNDY wished the Senator would forego his objections, and instanced a case during the present session where he had his name recorded by one of the reporters as voting against a measure, when, in fact, he had not voted at all. On the next morning, he stated the matter to the Senate, and asked permission to have his name recorded in the affirmative, which was granted.

Mr. KING was desirous that courtesy should be extended to the Senator, and that he be permitted to record his vote; and the course was the less objectionable, as the result could not be varied by granting the permission.

Mr. BENTON was inflexible; he had (as he before observed) for the last eighteen years, pursued the same policy, and could not consent to yield the point now. He would so far yield, however, as to move to reconsider the vote, by which means the same object could be more safely attained.

Mr. CUTHBERT here rose and observed that he had hitherto remained silent while this subject was under discussion, holding a peculiar position in relation to it. With those with whom he was accustomed to act, he agreed not in terms merely, but in sincerity of heart, in essential principles; it was, therefore, always painful to him to separate himself from them where their feelings were deeply engaged, or where they believed they were vindicating the interests or honor of the country. When he said this much, he believed there would be confidence placed in the sincerity of the motives which governed him in the course he was about to take. Having hitherto been unwilling to embarrass his friends by an expression of sentiments adverse to that policy which they believed was the best for the country, and having under this feeling been silent while this subject was debated, offering no amendment and taking no part in the discussion, he now thought that the moment had arrived when it would be proper to explain his position fully to the Senate. It was this: he essentially agreed with his friends that there ought to be a separation between the business of the Government and that of the banks, and he believed there was sufficient evidence in the last year that the country was prepared for it and would sustain his friends in effecting that separation. But he was not willing to go beyond that which was essentially necessary for effecting that object; he was not willing to go to the extent of abandoning that medium by which the commerce of the country is carried on. He could have wished to have explained himself further, but that species of indisposition which rendered it difficult for him to address the Senate, as well as the sudden surprise occasioned by taking the important vote just announced, prevented his so doing.

Under these circumstances, and saying as he did to his friends that he believed that the principles on which they acted were in accordance with the form of our Goverment and the character of our people; and believing, too, that their struggle was to maintain the rights of the people and that equality in our social compact which was essential to the preservation of our institutions—honoring and loving them as he did for the purity of their intentions, and the ability with which they sustained the cause they were advocating, and sympathizing with them, as he always had done, and should continue to do while he had life, he felt the deepest pain in making the motion he now did, to strike out the 23d section of the bill.

The CHAIR stated that the motion of the Senator from Georgia was not then in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON'S motion, and the reconsideration of the vote on Mr. RIVES'S amendment was ordered.

After a brief interval, Messrs. BAYARD and PIERCE, the two Senatorswho were absent, arriving, the question was again taken on Mr. RIVES'S substitute, and it was rejected—yeas 22, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, and White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

Mr. CUTHBERT then renewed his motion to strike out the 23d section.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed a wish to address the Senate on this amendment, and moved an adjournment, but withdrew his motion at the suggestion of

Mr. GRUNDY, on whose motion the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, after which

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
THURSDAY, March 22, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, on leave, presented the following petitions on the subject of the late duel, all of which were referred to the select committee having that subject under consideration, viz: Stephen Emery and 51 others, citizens of Paris; Peter A. W. Eaton, and 45 others of Plymouth; of Ebenezer Bickford, and 49 others of Newburgh; of Alansa Johnson, and 20 others of Atkinson; of J. M. Hill, and 29 others of Philipsburg; of Josiah Farwell, and 110 others of Pittsfield; all in the State of Maine.

Mr. HENRY presented the petition of a number of citizens of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying for an investigation of the late duel that resulted in the death of the Hon. J. CILLEY, and that efficient means may be adopted to put a stop in future to this murderous practice; which, on motion of Mr. H. was referred to the select committee to which that subject is referred.

Messrs. DAVIS of Pennsylvania, MORRIS of Ohio, and WILLIAMS of New Hampshire, severally presented petitions on the same subject.

All the above were referred to the select committee.

Mr. GOODE, on leave, presented a petition on the subject of the National road.

Mr. LAWLER, on leave, presented a petition for a post route in Alabama.

Mr. HOPKINS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution of Mr. SLADE, calling for information in relation to the public lands was adopted, [see proceedings in the Globe of last evening.] Mr. H. made the motion on the ground that it would be impracticable to furnish the information called for during the present session. The motion lies over.

Reports from standing committees were then called for.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAIG reported Senate bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Thomas Carter, deceased, without amendment.

Mr. HARPER made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Smith, one of the heirs of Ballard Smith.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia reported a bill for the relief of Susannah Rowe, widow of John Rowe, deceased.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. SNYDER reported a bill authorizing the survey and continuation of the National road from Vandalia, in the State of Illinois, to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri: read twice, committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER communicated to the House a letter from Mr. HUNTER, the assistant Doorkeeper, notifying the House of the decease of OVERTON CARR, esq. the principal Doorkeeper.

Mr. MERCER then submitted a resolution in relation thereto, that the House adjourn at four o'clock this afternoon, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late Mr. CARR; that the expenses thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and that the widow be paid the salary of the deceased to the end of the present session of Congress; which was agreed to.

LANDS FOR SCHOOLS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland then resumed his remarks on the resolution submitted by him, some time since, to grant a certain quantity of the public lands to the old States for the use of schools, equivalent to that granted to the new States.

Mr. LAWLER obtained the floor, but gave way to a motion to a call for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House, transmitting the letter of General Jesup, dated Fort Jupiter, December 7, 1837; which, on motion of Mr. BRONSON, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Adjutant General and Paymaster, in relation to the number of volunteers and militia engaged in the service of the United States, and showing the difference in expense of such troops and the regular troops of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. MERCER, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ——— in the chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1838."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HALSTEAD to strike out the item of $4,000 for the jet d'eau, on the south side of the centre foot-way in front of the Capitol.

Mr. HALSTEAD, who was entitled to the floor, replied at some length to the remarks make on yesterday by Mr. LINCOLN.

Mr. BOON said that it was not his intention to follow the member from New Jersey [Mr. HALSTEAD] through the whole of his tirade which he poured forth yesterday against the late and present Administrations of the people's own choosing. He had listened attentively to the gentleman's harangue, and he must say, that he had not supposed that there was a human being to be found upon the face of the earth, who could, in the space of two hours, have detailed or brought to view so great a number of gross absurdities and undignified allusions, as were summed up in the gentleman's speech on yesterday. Nor was he ever before so sensible of the advantages of being "well-born" and "college bred." This was very strikingly exhibited in the gentleman's illustration of what constituted a dandy. That gentleman, in the true character of the revengeful adder, whose poison is under his tongue, commenced his attack upon the Administration by making invidious comparisons. He was pleased to call the friends of the Administration Van Jacks, and the Administration itself he very modestly and respectfully (according to his vocabulary of learning) pronounced to be a dandy Administration. A dandy, he said, generally wore corsets and dickeys, and went in debt more than it was able to pay. Such, he said, was the true character of the present Administration. The President and Vice President, he said, one or both of them, wore corsets and dickeys, but he did not know whether they were black or white. Dickeys, the gentleman had said, bore a very close affinity to darkies or blackies, and he had added much more of the like disgraceful slang.

The member from New Jersey made quite a display about the increase of public expenditure in the way of stationery and public printing, and introduced items to show that the heads of Departments had been furnished with a certain amount for newspapers; and, among others, had particularly dwelt upon one called the Turf Register. But the gentleman took especial care not to say any thing about the sum of public money that had been expended for his particular benefit, by way of books, newspapers, paper, pens, wafers, sealing wax, etc. He [Mr. B.] should like to know how much stationery had been consumed by the member from New Jersey, in enclosing bank Whig speeches, and other Opposition stuff of like character.

If the number of public documents have been increased during the late and present Administrations, to what party is that item of public expenditure to be charged? Surely not to the Administration party; for it will be found that in nineteen cases out of twenty, where calls have been made, calculated to swell the amount for printing and for paper, it has been by calls made by the Opposition. To have heard the gentleman's harangue, one would have supposed the gentleman to be one of the greatest economists of the age; but on looking across the hall, he discovered the gentleman standing behind a larger pile of public documents, than he had seen on the table of any member at the present session of Congress, while he was addressing the House.

But it was useless for him to say more in reply to one who (to use a backwoods phrase) had been literally "used up" by a distinguished "Whig" gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN.] In the whole Whig ranks in that House, there had, as yet, been but one solitary individual—that is the honorable member from the Nashville district, in the State of Tennessee—who could muster moral courage enough to thank the gentleman from New Jersey for his wholesale denunciation of the Administration.

It seemed to him that the gentleman from New Jersey started upon a wrong scent; and that the greater part of what he intended to be prejudicial to others, was applicable to himself also. The gentleman declared in the outset of his speech, that this Administration was a dandy Administration. Now, Mr. B. considered that this came with rather a bad grace from the gentleman from New Jersey, for if he had been called upon to point out one of the members of the House who, above all others, wore the most dandy-like appearance, he should have, unhesitatingly, pointed to the member from New Jersey. Who would suspect a gentleman of talking about dandies who had to get on a stump to look over his cravat, or take off his coat to get his fingers in the pockets of his vest. Why, sir, it is sublimely ridiculous. Mr. B. believed there would, at all times, be found in this country political demagogues who will be continually finding fault, and with such persons the gentleman might be classed. In fact, that gentleman's speech of yesterday could be compared to nothing better than an old woman churning with a churn without a lid, who bespattered every one that came near her. But the people had been humbugged long enough by such speeches, and would pay but little attention to them. They had heard the cry of wolf, wolf, too long, when there was no wolf to put any faith in such false alarms.

Mr. LINCOLN rose and made a few remarks in reply to Mr. HALSTEAD'S remarks of to-day, explanatory of his own remarks of yesterday.

Mr. MERCER moved an amendment to Mr. HALSTEAD'S motion, so as to complete the grounds in the plan heretofore proposed; which, after a few words from Mr. EWING, was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved to strike from the bill the two items of $950 for clerk in the office of the clothing bureau, and $500 for the messenger to the same; which was agreed to, and the amount transferred to another branch of the service, on Mr. McKAY'S motion.

Mr. MALLORY sent to the Clerk's table, to be read, a letter from Commodore Dallas, in reply to Mr. M's remarks, some time since, on the navy; and, without recognising the right to be questioned for what he said on that occasion, made a statement in relation thereto, saying that the refutation of Commodore Dallas was to him entirely unsatisfactory, and he could not, therefore, retract his charge.

Mr. BELL then renewed his proposition for a reduction of salaries of one-fourth, in a modified form, by leaving out the contingency of the Independent Treasury bill passing.

Mr. CUSHMAN raised the point of order.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order, on the ground that it would be engrafting a measure to regulate salaries on a bill to appropriate money to pay those already in existence—two distinct propositions.

Mr. BELL took an appeal from this decision, and adverted to former precedents.

Mr. HAYNES did not see the force of argument of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, inasmuch as the mere permission of the House could not be drawn into precedent in violation of its law. He very well remembered a case in which an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which was obviously out of order, but no exception being taken, the bare permission of the House that it should be received and acted upon, would, by that gentleman's argument, be construed into precedent. That the amendment referred to was out of order, was manifested by the decision of the House upon an amendment of similar character subsequently offered to the same original proposition, and the point of order being raised, it was ruled out by the House. Therefore, permission to offer and entertain a proposition was not such a precedent as would be an authoritative exposition of the rules of the House as to bring it within the range of order when the question of order had not been raised. Mr. H. would not make a display of learning, but would remind the honorable gentleman from Tennessee of a simple and well known maxim,

"Malus usus abolendus est."

He would not, therefore, agree that the rules should be set aside by the gentleman's precedents.

Mr. BELL rejoined that the latter case alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia was excluded by the operation of a new rule.

Mr. HAYNES replied, that as the case to which he had referred might be misunderstood in consequence of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, it was proper that he should state it fully. That case, in its totality, was this. When the bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1837 was under consideration, the gentleman from Tennessee offered an amendment, proposing a distribution of such surplus revenue as might be in the Treasury on the first of January, 1838. That proposition was permitted to be entertained, no one raising the question of order. Subsequently, another amendment was proposed to the same bill, the object of which was to bring down the revenue from customs, by a revision and reduction of the tariff. To this the question of order was raised, and sustained by the House. This case illustrates the little force which we should give to precedents. Consequently, the permission to offer a proposition does not justify the inference that it was necessarily in order, when the point of order had not been raised.

The decision of the CHAIR was then sustained by the committee, without a division.

Mr. BELL moved to reduce the clause appropriating the pay and mileage of members and delegates of Congress from $567,680 to $425,760, and of the pay of the officers of the two Houses from $40,400, to $30,300; which, after a few words from Messrs. BELL, MERCER, REED, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, was disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House; and, on motion of Mr. C. the same were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then gave notice that he should call up the appropriation bills again to-morrow and next day.

The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, pursuant to the order adopted this morning,

The House adjourned.

Mr. WAGENER presented, on Monday last, the memorial of the citizens of Easton, Pennsylvania, and its vicinity, setting forth the prominent advantages of its location for a national foundry, and asking for it the consideration of Congress, believing it to be the most suitable place that could be selected, and had said memorial referred to the select committee who have this subject under consideration, and that it be printed.

Mr. W. also presented the petition of the citizens of the borough of Easton, calling upon Congress for its interposition in the late unfortunate duel, and to adopt such measures as the country demands. It was referred to the select committee, who have the subject now under consideration.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GLOBE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 22, 1838.

SIR: In the very brief sketch of the remarks made by me yesterday, on Mr. Halstead's motion to strike an item from the Appropriation bill, I am reported to have said, in terms quite too general and unqualified, that the appropriations of which the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Halstead) had complained, and which he had characterized as "in accordance with the Jeffersonian, Democratic, Republican, Jacksonian policy," should have my support. My remarks, on the contrary, were explicitly restricted in their application to such appropriations as had been recommended by the Committee on the Public Buildings, of which I am a member, and which I contended were prudent, economical, and urgently required by a proper regard to the public interest. I further incidentally adverted to the objections insisted upon by the gentleman from New Jersey, that unreasonable and prodigal expenditures were incurred in the employment of unnecessary clerks in the Land and Patent offices; and stated that, so far from there being here present cause for complaint, a great and satisfactory reform had been effected in each of those departments, under the operation of the laws of the last Congress providing for their reorganization, and which had been brought about by the concurrent and united action of both political parties, in measures to which I had given a most cordial support. I distinctly stated that I was no friend to the Administration; that its general course of policy met my most decided disapprobation, and, in the humble measure of my ability, had received my zealous opposition, but that I would not direct an indiscriminate hostility to every proposition which might be offered, merely because they came from the Government or its agents; that whatever my honest judgment should sanction I would adopt, contenting myself, in the faithful discharge of duty, with rejecting whatever that judgment, properly informed, requires me to condemn.

I do not profess to give the precise language used by me on the occasion, but such was the sentiment, distinctly expressed. I may think proper to present the whole of my remarks hereafter, but in the meanwhile I respectfully ask that you would do me the justice to insert in your paper this correction of a misapprehension (doubtless altogether inadvertent) of your Reporter.

Your ob't servant,
LEVI LINCOLN.

IN SENATE,
THURSDAY, March 22, 1838.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of Japhet Wilkinson; which was referred to the Committee on the Patent Office.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying that Congress will take measures to suppress duelling: laid on the table.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of Ezra Chapman, Lieutenant in the Revolutionary war, praying for a commutation: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. KING presented the memorial of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile, praying remuneration for expenses incurred in equipping a company of volunteers for the Indian war in Florida: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KING also presented the memorial of several citizens of Mobile, asking an appropriation, for the purpose of building a light-house at Cedar Point: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced a bill granting to the Galena and Chicago Union Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Captain Nathaniel Goodwin, and a bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of the Baron de Kalb, late of the Revolutionary army; which were read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Joseph Nibur, deceased; and, on motion of Mr. W. the same was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, after a brief explanation from Mr. W. was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Nancy Contraman and others.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph Morris, deceased; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution which was considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Lafayette, in the State of Indiana, and from thence down along the Vermilion of the Illinois river to La Salle, in the county of La Salle, in the State of Illinois.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of importing one or more sets of the most approved apparatus, now employed on the coast of Europe in the light-houses.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire whether a more efficient, safe and useful system of locating, constructing, lighting, and managing the light-houses necessary for our coast may not be adopted.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the joint resolution directing the expenditure of the appropriation for the removal of the troops of the United States from Fort Gibson, reported the same without amendment; and,

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the same was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEVIER advocated the bill with some zeal, showing at the same time the absolute necessity there was for its immediate adoption: the location of the fort at the exact point named in the resolusolution, was also contended for.

Mr. GRUNDY moved to amend the bill so as to give the Secretary of War discretionary power. Mr. G. thought the price proposed extravagant; that no land in that section of country could be worth $15,000, the price stipulated to be paid.

Mr. FULTON observed, in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] that the value of the situation of Old Fort Smith was greatly increased by means of the improvements erected upon the point by Captain Rodgers, the present owner of the property. There were six houses of various descriptions now used as stores, dwelling houses, and warehouses, worth from eight to ten thousand dollars, and which would be of great value to the United States in uses connected with the erection and occupation of the fort. The site of Old Fort Smith was directly upon the line which separates the Choctaw lands from the State of Arkansas. The old fort was situated on the Indian lands; and the houses and other improvements of Captain Rodgers, within a few hundred feet of the fort, were within the State of Arkansas. For the use of the fort, the lands of Captain Rodgers were indispensable. They were purchased by him after the final settlement of the boundary line. This point was one of the most eligible upon the Arkansas river for purposes of defence, and for the enforcement of the intercourse laws. This point, and one other on the opposite side of the river, a few miles lower down, were the only places recommended as at all suited to the object by the commissioners. The country above upon the river, for many miles, is low and subject to inundation, and cannot be used for the erection of a fort; and the consequence is, that if the new fort is to be erected for the defence of the frontier of Arkansas, it must be built either at the point where Old Fort Smith is situated, or upon the highlands, at the mouth of Lee's Creek. The Secretary of War, said Mr. F. has already declared his preference in favor of Fort Smith; and a proposition is now in his possession, binding upon Captain Rodgers to sell to the Government the quantity of his land required, with all the buildings and other improvements upon it, for the sum of $15,000. No difficulty can, therefore, grow out of the provision in the resolution designating the place where the fort is to be erected; and knowing Captain Rodgers as I do, I feel authorized to say he will not attempt to increase the sum he has proposed to take for his lands.

This resolution has been introduced in conformity with the views of the Secretary of War, who has stated to me that he had decided in favor of Fort Smith.

As to the importance of this work of defence to the State of Arkansas, and the urgent necessity of its immediate erection, my colleague has already so fully presented those points to the Senate as to make it unnecessary for me to offer any further remarks upon the subject.

Mr. SEVIER explained at length the subject, showing the present exposed state of the frontier, and maintained that the location of the fort at the spot designated in the joint resolution was necessary to protect the settlers, and quiet their apprehensions. He could scarcely restrain his temper within bounds, when he heard gentlemen talk of dollars and cents, at a time when the lives of a whole frontier settlement were in jeopardy. Report after report had been made in favor of the spot, and yet the Secretary of War had neglected to provide what he ought to have done in relation to the subject.

Mr. PRESTON thought it would be better to leave the matter in the hands of the Secretary, whose business it was to look into such things, and whose opportunity of judging of the fitness of location, &c. were far better than any Senator could have. Besides he was opposed to forcing the Secretary to take positions at a stipulated price. He [Mr. P.] thought the sum of $15,000 really extravagant for any land in that quarter of the country, and he felt more disposed to rely on the statements of the Secretary and his officers, than on the parole statements of gentlemen who could not have the same opportunity of information.

Mr. SEVIER was sorry that the Senator from South Carolina could not preserve his consistency throughout. It was but a little while ago that Senator was for trusting as little as possible to Executive discretion in any thing. Now he is for leaving this whole matter to the option of the Secretary. Mr. S. said he thought he had shown the necessity that existed for occupying the present site of the old fort [Smith] and that year after year the Secretary had omitted to place it there, because he [the Secretary] did not conceive that the original resolution on this subject comported with his views. Mr. S. said he would agree that it should be so amended, as to direct the Secretary to purchase Fort Smith, provided the same could be obtained at a reasonable amount.

Mr. GRUNDY suggested that the words "at or near Fort Smith," be inserted; which was agreed to, and the resolution ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the bill from the House, for the relief of Jacob Hawks, without amendment.

Mr. KING, from the Committee of Commerce, reported the bill from the House, for the relief of Samuel Potter and James Cassedy, without amendment. Also, without amendment, the bill for the relief of John Peterson.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill, and after a debate between Messrs. CALHOUN and WEBSTER,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which

The Independent Treasury bill was again taken up; and

Mr. TIPTON handed to the Chair the following amendment, which he proposed to offer, when in order:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, upon the sales of public lands or otherwise, to be collected, and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable, and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States. No such duties, taxes, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received, otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 23, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented petitions on the late duel, from Braintree, Mass.; Harrisburg, Pa.; Cayuga co. N. Y.; Seneca co. N. Y.; Windham co. Conn.; Poland, Me.; Chelsea, Mass.; Canton, Mass.; Holliston, Mass.; and Scituate, Mass.

Mr. MATTHIAS MORRIS, also, on leave, presented the memorial of William M. Fahnestock and 23 other citizens of Lancaster county, and parts adjacent in the State of Pennsylvania, asking Congress to pass a law for the suppression of duelling.

Mr. ANDREWS, on leave, presented a petition from citizens of Yeates co. N. Y. asking the expulsion of the members of this House who were engaged in the duel which resulted in the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, and for the passage of a law to prevent duelling.

Mr. BIRDSALL asked leave to present a petition on the same subject.

Mr. EWING objected.

Mr. McKENNAN asked leave to present two petitions on the same subject, and no objection being then made, they were received and referred to the select committee.

Mr. ANDREWS also presented a memorial on the same subject.

Mr. NOBLE also presented a similar petiion.

Memorials on private claims were severally presented by Mr. DOWNING of Florida, Mr. LYON of Alabama, and Mr. SOUTHGATE of Kentucky.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

Mr. McKENNAN, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will proceed, on Monday next, at 2 o'clock, to the election of a principal doorkeeper, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. OVERTON CARR.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland suggested its postponement, as the Committee on Accounts had the subject of the appointments of the officers of the Hall under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, at the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, moved to postpone it till Monday week.

Mr. HAYNES opposed the motion.

Mr. BOON moved to postpone it till the first Monday in December next, on the ground that, by a resolution adopted yesterday, the salary of the late doorkeeper was extended to the end of the present session, and they had got along since the first Monday in September last, with only one doorkeeper.

Mr. WILLIAMS took the same ground, and thought it probable such an officer might be dispensed with altogether.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, advocated a postponement, on the ground that the Committee on Accounts might throw some light on the subject committed to them, connected with this office. In reply to an inquiry from Mr. HAYNES, Mr. J. stated it as probable that they would report early in the week.

Mr. BOON'S motion was disagreed to; that of Mr. WILLIAMS agreed to; and the resolution was postponed till Monday week.

Mr. HALL of Vermont, having obtained leave of the House, sent to the Chair the Globe of last evening, (March 22,) from which the Clerk read as follows:

"On the 11th February, 1815, when the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means for regulating the deposite of the money of the United States in certain local banks was before the House of Representatives, Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government.

In favor of this motion the votes of the following gentlemen are recorded on the journal (page 359) in the affirmative:

"Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Beaty, Bell, Binney, Briggs, Burges, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Claiborne, Clark, Clayton, Corwin, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Foster, Gamble, Garland, Gholson, Gordon, Gorham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Hiester, William Jackson, Ebenezer Jackson, Janes, Henry Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Letcher, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Martindale, Marshall, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Miner, Moore, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Robertson, William B. Shepard, Slade, Spangler, Steele, William P. Taylor, Tompkins, Trumbull, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Wise, and Young."

Mr. HALL said he would not ask for the further reading of the paragraph. The article proceeded to state that the gentlemen whose names had just been read, himself among the number, having thus in 1835 voted in favor of dispensing with the agency of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government, were now, in 1838, opposing a measure of the same character; and then followed a dissertation upon "Federal patriotism," "Federal consistency," &c. &c. with which it was unnecessary to trouble the House.

Mr. H. said a statement similar to that in the Globe had been published in some of the papers in his own State, and his object now was to set the matter right before his constituents and the country. He never did, on that or any other occasion, give any such vote as that represented in the Globe. In order to meet the evidence fully, he would call for the reading of the journal, to which the article in the Globe referred. The journal was accordingly read by the Clerk, as follows:

"The House resumed the consideration of the bill (No. 563) regulating the deposite of the money of the United States in certain local banks. The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. ROBERTSON, that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government. And after debate, the question was put on the motion made by Mr. ROBERTSON for the recommitment of the bill, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 91, nays 115."

Mr. H. said the journal might perhaps be considered as sustaining the view taken by the Globe, but he should show that the journal, if it bore such a construction, was erroneous. The fact was, no vote whatever was taken on the instructions moved by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] but the vote which is recorded on the journal was taken on the naked question of recommitting the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means—no vote whatever having been taken on the instructions.

Before the vote on Mr. ROBERTSON's proposition was put, Mr. FILLMORE of New York required, as any member, by the rules of the House, had a right to do, that the question of commitment should be separated from the question of instructions; and the question being divided, the votes for commitment were—ayes 91, noes 115, the 91 ayes being the same gentlemen whose names are given in the Globe. The motion to commit being lost, no question could possibly be put on the instructions. In proof of the facts thus stated, Mr. H. read extracts from the three daily papers then published in Washington, giving an account of the proceedings of that day. The extracts were as follows:

Extract from the Globe of Feb. 12, 1835.

The question being on Mr. ROBERTSON's motion to recommit the (deposite) bill to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions, &c. Mr. FILLMORE asked for a division of the question to recommit with instructions. The question was then taken by yeas and nays, which had been previously ordered, on the motion to recommit the bill, and decided in the negative—ayes 91, nays 115.

Extract from the Telegraph of Feb. 12, 1835.

Mr. FILLMORE called for a division of the question, and which having been put on that part of the motion, viz: "to recommit the bill," the motion was rejected—yeas 91, nays 115.

Extract from the Intelligencer of Feb. 12, 1835.

Mr. FILLMORE now demanded a division of the question, and it was accordingly put; first simply on recommitment, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows, viz: yeas 91, nays 115, so the House refused to recommit the bill.

Mr. HALL said he had called the attention of the Clerk of the House to this subject; who, on examination, had ascertained that a memorandum of the fact of Mr. FILLMORE requiring a division had been entered on the minute books, kept at the Clerk's desk on that day; but that, by inadvertence, a notice of the division was omitted to be inserted, in writing out the journal. The facts he now stated would appear from a correspondence he had held with the Clerk, which was now read, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
December 19, 1837.

SIR: I have received your communication of this day's date. I handed it over for answer to Mr. Burch, the chief clerk of my office, who writes up the journal of the House. That answer I herewith enclose; and am, with the most perfect respect and esteem,

Your obedient servant,
W. S. FRANKLIN,
Clerk House of Reps. United States.

Hon. HILAND HALL,
House of Reps. United States.

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPS. U. S.
December 19, 1837.

SIR: In answer to the letter of the Hon. HILAND HALL, of this date, addressed to you, and which you have referred to me, in which he states that "it appears from the printed journal of the House, of February 11, 1835, the bill regulating the deposite of the money of the United States in certain local banks, being under consideration—that a question was taken on the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency of banks; and that on the question to recommit with such instructions—the yeas were 91, nays 115," and suggesting that there is some error in the printed journal as he is confident he did not give such a vote, I make the following explanatory stated.

I have referred to the printed journal of the 11th of February, 1835, and find it stated that the House resumed the consideration of the bill mentioned by Mr. HALL, and that the question recurred on the motion by Mr. ROBERTSON on the preceding day, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government, and that the question was put on the motion for the "recommitment of the bill," and was decided as Mr. HALL has stated—yeas 91, nays 115. The entry does not show, as is mentioned in Mr. HALL's letter, that the instructions were involved in the vote, nor was it intended to show it.

I have, also, referred to the short notes or minutes taken by you at the table in the House. From these it appears that immediately previous to the putting the question, Mr. FILLMORE of New York called for a division, so as that the question be put separately on recommitting, and on the instructions.

Mr. FILLMORE's call for the division is not stated on the printed journal; but then it is distinctly stated that the question was on recommitment: that question failing, the separate question on the instructions could not, consequently, be put.

The only error, if error it is, is in the omission to set forth Mr. FILLMORE's call for the division. This is sometimes done, as the entries themselves commonly show the fact that a question had been divided; in the present case, the question is expressly stated to have been on the recommitment: if the question had involved more than the recommitment, the entry would have gone on to have said with the instructions aforesaid. If the question on the recommitment had been decided in the affirmative, instead of the negative, the question would then have been, of course, put on the instructions, which would have made it apparent that the question had been divided. In writing up the journal, often at a late hour at night, the different views which it seems, now, may be taken of the subject, did not occur to me, and hence, to save what I then deemed superfluous writing, the omission to enter the call for the division of the question. With much respect, sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Signed) S. BURCH.

Col WALTER S. FRANKLIN,
Clerk House of Reps. United States.

Mr. H. did not wish to be understood as intending to cast the slightest imputation on the clerk. He had no doubt whatever that the omission was unintentional; and the explanation of the clerk was perfectly satisfactory. Nor did he wish to be misunderstood in any other particular. In making this explanation of his own vote, he did not mean to intimate an opinion, that if, on the occasion referred to, he had voted to recommit the bill, with the instructions, that it would necessarily follow he was in favor of passing a bill in conformity with the instructions. On the contrary, he knew that it was a legitimate and parliamentary mode of making opposition to a measure, to endeavor to amend it in such manner that it would lose the support of its original friends, and become unsatisfactory to all sides of the House. He might have given such vote, though opposed to a bill of the character specified in the instructions, as the most effectual means of defeating the bill then under consideration. And there were doubtless other grounds on which a vote on a collateral question of this description might be given, without any intention of supporting the bill, when it had assumed its amended form. But he would not dwell on this matter.

Mr. H. said it was not his intention to occupy the time of the House in commenting on the evidence he had introduced to show the falsity of the statement in the Globe. He had shown, he trusted, to the entire satisfaction of the House, that in giving his vote on the 11th of February, 1835, in favor of recommitting a bill to which he was opposed, to the committee which had reported it, the question being, simply, "shall the bill be recommitted?" he had not voted, as had been represented in that paper, "in favor of dispensing with the agency of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government;" in fact had not voted at all on that question, and for one of the best reasons in the world, that no such question had been put. The object he had in view being thus answered, he would detain the House no longer.

ALABAMA VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. CHAPMAN, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of paying the late Governor of Alabama and his staff, for the time they were actually engaged in obtaining, organizing, mustering, and marching volunteers, during the year 1836, in consequence of the disturbances with the Creek Indians, and for expenses incurred in that service.

Reports from standing committees were then called for.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that the Committee of Ways and Means had received certain documents from the War Department, in relation to the expenditures of the State of New York, on the Canada frontier, and he moved their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reported a bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes, [not to issue more than $10,000,000, in not more than for $100 each, at not more than 6 per cent. per annum, to be redeemed within two years.]

At the request of Mr. BOND the bill was read at lenth.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that it was accompanied by a report, setting forth the necessity of the bill.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a counter report, containing the views of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means on the Independent Treasury bill. He said it might be proper to state that it had not been submitted to the majority, but had been made in pursuance of an understanding in the committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked, that as the gentleman's explanation might not be understood, it was proper to state that the minority report had not been seen by a single member of the majority.

Mr. RIVES moved that 10,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority be printed; which was agreed to.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Williams, deceased.

Also, a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Nathaniel Irish.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PARKER reported a bill for the relief of Joseph Dukes.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Connecticut reported a bill for the relief of William Ferguson.

Mr. EWING reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Miller.

ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. MERCER reported a bill to provide for the construction of the Cumberland road through the towns of Louisburg and Salem, in the State of Ohio; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CHAPMAN reported Senate bill, without amendment, to establish an additional office in the State of Alabama, which Mr. C. moved at first to postpone till Monday next; but on the CHAIR stating that the bill required commitment, on motion of Mr. C. it was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LANDS TO SCHOOLS.

The unfinished business of the morning was then resumed, being the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland to grant an equal quantity of land to the old States to that granted to the new, for purposes of education.

Mr. LAWLER, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House for some time in reply to Mr. JOHNSON; but, without concluding, gave way for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry Executive communications, viz:

1. From the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, accompanied with copies of the contracts made by Gen. Jesup in relation to the removal of Indians.

On motion of Mr. BELL, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

2. From the same, transmitting copies of papers relating to the title of the United States to the Friend ore bank, near Harper's Ferry.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, referred to the committee on the subject of a national foundry.

3. From the same, transmitting a report of the survey for the improvement of the navigation of the Alleghany river.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SIBLEY moved the printing of three thousand extra copies, which lies over.

4. From the same, transmitting a response to a reselution, calling for a copy of the answer to the letter of General Jesup, dated 20th of December, 1837, in which the Secretary of War states that, as the letter alluded to, contained only a relation of the commanding officer, and an assertion of his individual opinions, it did not, in his opinion, require an answer, and no answer was given.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

5. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting returns of the cost of erecting and establishing the principal Mint and its branches, including the buildings.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government for the year 1838."

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole, with a few exceptions which will be hereafter noticed, were taken up, and concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment of the committee, increasing the item for the relief and proctection of American seamen in foreign coun tries, $10,000.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD made some few remarks, in explanation of his remarks in Committee of the Whole, and showing the manner in which this appropriation was disbursed by the Department, and contrasting it with the manner in which it had been disbursed heretofore.

Mr. HOWARD replied to the gentleman from North Carolina, setting forth the manner in which this fraud was drawn upon, and showing that there was none of it laying in the hands of Government agents unexpended, and went on to exhibit the evil consequences of not making these appropriations in due time. The uncertainty which existed in relation to the payment of these drafts was the main cause of the losses of the Government, and he hoped some arrangement might yet be made by which this fund would never be out.

Mr. ADAMS did not consider that the delay which had taken place on this bill, in consequence of the discussion of this item, would be productive of evil, because by it we had discovered the cause of the required increase of this fund. It was now discovered that it was in consequence of the manner of making remittances abroad that this fund had to be increased, and this being discovered, he hoped a remedy might be applied to meet the case. He believed a new mode of remitting this fund had been adopted, which acted most unfavorably. The new system was for the consuls to draw on the Department of State, without regard to the rates of exchange; and it was in consequence of this that bills had been negotiated at a loss of twenty-five per cent. The old system was to transmit the funds at a time when exchange was most favorable to this country, and this system he (Mr. A.) considered by far the most preferable, and he hoped the Committee on Expenditures of that Department would see to this matter, and endeavor to have it remedied.

Mr. MATHIAS MORRIS stated that, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures of this department, he had made some inquiry in relation to the disbursements of this fund, and had received communications from that department on the subject. He then sent to the Clerk's table the letters he had received from the department, which set forth fully the manner in which this fund was disbursed by that department.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the practice now existing was not only according to law, but he would rather have these accounts audited here by the Treasury officers than by our foreign ministers abroad, as they were formerly. He considered the rules established by the Department of State in 1834 the correct and proper rule of action, and if it might have been proper that another course should have been pursued twenty or thirty years ago, it was not proper now. Drafts could now be negotiated on New York as well as they could be on London or Paris, and he could see no objection to the present system pursued by the Department.

Mr. ADAMS reiterated his objections to this new system, and insisted that it was this system had cost the Government the additional appropriation asked for.

Mr. HOWARD dissented from the gentleman from Massachusetts, in relation to the conclusion which the gentleman had come to; and went into a brief explanation of the manner in which the fund was managed by the Department.

After a few remarks by Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD, the amendment of the committee was concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment in relation to the jet d'eau and the improvement of the public square around the Capitol.

After a few remarks by Messrs. HOWARD, MERCER, LINCOLN, UNDERWOOD, and HALSTEAD,

Mr. HALSTEAD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 93, nays 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The House then took up the amendment of $1,200 for distrbution of the first volume of the Documentary History of the Revolution; which, at the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, was nonconcurred in.

The House then took up the following amendment:

For the service of the General Post Office for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, in conformity to the act of second July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, four million six hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars, viz:

For transportation of mails -	$3,400,000
For compensation to postmasters -	935,000
For ship, steamboats, and way letters	31,000
For wrapping paper - -	20,000
For office furniture - -	6,000
For advertising - - -	25,000
For mail bags - - -	40,000
For blanks - - -	36,000
For mail locks and keys and stamps	9,000
For mail depredations and special agents - - - -	12,000
For clerks for offices - -	140,000
For miscellaneous - -	40,000

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio considered that if the item in this amendment of $140,000 for clerks for offices was agreed to, the items in the bill for the clerks and messengers in the Post Office Department ought to be struck out, because there would then, in his opinion, be a double appropriation for this purpose. He took it that it was the intention of the Postmaster General, by asking for this item, to supersede by it the necessity of the other appropriation to which he had alluded; and if this was the case, it would be proper that one of these items should be struck out.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the gentleman from Ohio was mistaken in the view he had taken of this question. He explained that the Clerks in the Post Office Department in Washington, had always been paid out of the public Treasury, and the item for their pay had always been inserted in this bill, but the Clerks in the Post Offices throughout the country had been paid out of the Post Office fund heretofore, and no notice had ever been taken of it in the bills making appropriations for the expenditures of the Government. It had now, however, in consequence of the law of 1836, which required this fund to be paid into the Treasury, become necessary to make this appropriation in our appropriation bills. This appropriation, as it did formerly, was made from the Post Office fund, but the other appropriation, for the Head of the Department and clerks and messengers, were made out of the common fund of the nation.

Mr. WHITTLESEY did not consider that he was mistaken, and still believed these two appropriations to be for the same purpose, because it never had been the practice at the Post Office Department to keep any account of the salaries of the clerks in the different post offices. The plan pursued was for the different postmasters to pay all the expenses of their offices, for clerks as well as other expenses, out of the money which they collected; and no account was ever kept at the Post Office Department, of the salaries of these clerks; consequently, this appropriation of $140,000 in the amendment could not be for that object, unless the system of doing business in that Department had been changed lately. Perhaps the chairman of the Post Office committee could give some information as to that fact.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said he had no information other than what was contained in the public document lying on the tables of the House. He, however, had always understood that the clerks of the different post offices throughout the country were paid out of the post office fund, and that the clerks of the Department in this city were paid out of the common fund in the Treasury.

Mr. HAYNES said if the gentleman from Ohio would examine the Blue Book, he would find a list of some four hundred clerks in post offices distributed throughout the country; and, at a very moderate compensation, it would require this item of $140,000 to pay them. It would be found, he believed, that these salaries would average considerably less than four hundred dollars; and no one, he thought, could complain of these salaries. It was true we had not been heretofore called on to make this appropriation, and it was very easily accounted for. The House heretofore never made any appropriations for the expenses of the Post Office Department, except the salaries of the Postmaster General, and the clerks in his office in this city—the other expenses of the Department being paid out of the Post Office fund, without it having any connection with the public Treasury. Since the reorganization of that Department, however, it was required that the Post Office fund should be paid into the Treasury, and it being paid in, it was necessary that this appropriation should be made to get it out again.

Mr. WHITTLESEY was still convinced that he was right in relation to this matter, and that the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Georgia, were wrong. Taking the Blue Book as a guide, and admitting that there were four hundred clerks to be paid out of this fund, it would show that there was some mistake about it, because it would be entirely too small for that purpose. His opinion was, that the Postmaster General, considering the state of the finance of the country, and of the Post Office Department, had introduced this item for the pay of the clerks in his office with a view of having them paid out of the Post Office fund; and if that was the case, the other appropriations ought to be struck out of the bill.

Mr. HAYNES stated, in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Ohio, in regard to the item of $140,000 being too small to pay the salaries of the four hundred clerks, without having any intercourse with the Department on the subject, that the natural inference in relation to it, was that the Postmaster General might have discovered that there were more clerks employed by the different postmasters than were necessary, and that he had restricted his estimate, in consequence of this. He knew that a very small compensation would exceed the item, and the only reasonable conclusion he could come to on the subject was that the Postmaster General intended to reduce the number of these clerks, and in consequence of this, had put this item at its present low rate.

Mr. McKAY explained the object of these items, and assured the House that they were entirely separate and distinct, and that both were necessary.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then stated that he would withdraw his objections to the amendment, for the present, and obtain the information he desired from the Post Office Department, between this time and the time when the bill would be placed upon its third reading.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave notice of an amendment he should move to-morrow to this amendment, providing for the manner in which the money should be paid, viz: out of the receipts of the Post Office Department; which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of an amendment for the reduction of salaries to the officers of the General Government, to the amount of salary paid to the Chief Justice of the States in which such officers are employed, and asked the CHAIR if it would be in order.

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

Several gentlemen rose to give notice of amendments, but, before they were submitted,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

Also, a petition from 128 women of Bradford, Luzerne, and McKean counties, a petition from 98 women of Bucks county, and a petition from 116 women of Columbia county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress immediately to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TROTTER presented the petition of the Trustees of Sharon College, Mississippi, asking for a grant of a section of land: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of a number of citizens of Richmond, Virginia, praying an examination of that place in reference to the selection of a site for a national foundry: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of 24 citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, against the practice of duelling, and asking Congress to pass a law preventing any person who shall be engaged in a duel from holding any office of trust, honor, or profit, under the United States: laid on the table.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of John P. Van Ness, President of the Metropolis Bank, stating that there had been some mistake in the correspondence transmitted to the Senate that had taken place between that bank and certain of the public departments, and asking for its correction: the memorial and documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Messrs. SWIFT and PRENTISS presented several petitions praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; the question of the reception of which were severally laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill to restore circuit jurisdiction to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia, was taken up, and after being amended, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Nieburt, deceased; and

The joint resolution directing the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the troops from Fort Gibson; were severally read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TIPTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of compensating Hiram H. Lewis and William T. Lewis, for horses lost by them while in the military service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of James J. Patterson; which was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The report from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims unfavorable to the petition of Philip Johnson, was considered and concurred in.

The following bills were severally taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading:

The bill granting pensions to certain widows;

The bill for the relief of Sutton Stephens; and

The bill for the relief of Ann S. Heileman.

The bill for the improvement of the river Wabash being taken up,

Mr. KING said that this bill should have been referred to the Committee on Commerce, which committee was supposed to have charge of the subjects alluded to, yet now it was reported from a different committee, and brought to the consideration of the Senate before proper time was had for giving it mature consideration. He asked, if Senators were pressed to act on such a subject, how far they were disposed to go, how much to spend in improvement of rivers and roads? He would really like to have some explanation of the business.

Mr. HUBBARD thought it extraordinary that this bill should be introduced; and, as it would be necessary to get rid of it at once, he should move to lay it on the table; on which question he would ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINN thought it would be better to refer the matter to the Committee on Commerce, where it would have an opportunity of undergoing ample investigation. He had not looked into the merits of the present bill; yet he expressed his intention of voting generally in favor of such measures,

Mr. HUBBARD said he had no objection to that course. He could hardly suppose it possible that he Committee on Commerce would ever report such a bill. He had examined its provisions, and never knew a bill so general in its nature. Mr. H. expressed himself perfectly contented that it should go to the committee named; but it could never receive his vote under any circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana hoped that the Senate would not be prejudiced against the bill, by the remarks of the Senator last up. The subject was one of great importance, in many points of view, which he should endeavor to show, when the proper time arrived.

Mr. TIPTON said in reply to the inquiry made by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] that the bill to improve the navigation of the Wabash, was introduced early in the session, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. This bill is not new to the Senate; it has been frequently before this body, and always referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals; that committee had reported the bill to the Senate, before the propositions for improving the navigation of White and Black rivers in Missouri and Arkansas was discussed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD,] seemed to think it extrarodinary that this bill is introduced here; the honorable member would now, by a moment's reflection, recollect that a similar bill passed in 1832; and in 1834, a bill of which the one now before us is a copy, passed the Senate, and the House of Representatives, of which latter House he was then a member. It has been the constant practice of Congress to appropriate money to improve rivers. The claims of the Hudson river, Savannah river, Cumberland river, Red river, Arkansas, Monongahela, and many other rivers of less importance than the Wabash, have been favorably reported on by the Committee on Commerce, and millions appropriated from the public Treasury to improve them. The States of Indiana and Illinois, between which this river is the line, at the point where this improvement is to be made, have organized a board of public works, and have commenced improving the Wabash; and he [Mr. T.] would propose to amend the bill, by authorizing the expenditure of the money under the authority of these States. The Wabash was the largest tributary of the Ohio, with a soil unsurpassed in point of fertility, with a population of more than half a million of people interested in its navigation. These people have a right to expect the General Government to aid in this work. He appealed not to the liberality, but to the justice of the Senate to pass the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD said such might have been the fact in relation to this bill being a copy of one which passed the Senate and House in 1834, but he was perfectly satisfied that it had never received his sanction, nor did he believe that of his colleague.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury Bill, when Mr. WALL addressed the Senate at great length in support of the bill.

After which

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 24, 1838.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, on leave, presented a petition for a private claim.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Britton Evans and Captain D. Rogers.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported adversely on the petitions of Jonathan Fair, Amos Allen, and Rebecca Mills; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, the petitions of John Snow and T. W. Norman were referred to the same Committee of the Whole to which general bill No. 176 was referred, it being a bill which includes their case.

Mr. PATTON, from the Committee on the Library, reported a bill to provide for the employment of an agent of the Library Committee.

Mr. PATTON, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to subscribe for ten numbers of "Niles's Register" for each member of the House, to be delivered once a week: Provided, the editor of said Register will agree to publish in, or as part of, said work, at least once a week, under the direction of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the journals of both Houses of Congress, with the yeas and nays on all questions: Provided further, that the editor of said Register will also agree to publish, at the end of every session of Congress, under the direction of the said officer of the House, a supplement to said work, containing all the laws passed thereat, and treaties ratified by the Senate, to which shall be prefixed a copious index, to be approved of by said officer, and furnish one copy thereof, free of charge, to each member of Congress for the time being.

Mr. PATTON said it was a matter of some consequence that this resolution should be adopted as soon as possible, though he had no objection to a brief postponement, if any gentleman desired it.

Mr. McKAY hoped the resolution would be permitted to lie over, for he was opposed to it, and hoped it would not be adopted.

Mr. MERCER moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, by which the documents in relation to the title of the United States to Friends Ore Bank was referred to the Select Committee on a National Foundry; which was agreed to, and Mr. M. moved its reference to the Judiciary.

Mr. McCLURE moved its reference to the Committee on the National Foundry.

These motions were briefly discussed by Messrs. McCLURE, THOMAS, JOHNSON of Maryland, MERCER, POPE, and HOWARD.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 17.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. —WEEKLY— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

The motion to commit to the Judiciary Committee was agreed to without a division.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report and estimates of Lieut. Stockton, superintendent of the harbor at Michigan City, Indiana, and the same of the harbor of St. Josephs, Michigan.

On motion of Mr. WHITE of Indiana, referred to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of the harbor bill.

The SPEAKER, also, laid before the House another communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Acting Quartermaster General, accompanied with sundy documents, respecting the measures taken to carry into effect the act of July, 1836, authorizing the laying out a military road on the western frontier, and the erection of military posts thereon.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON of Missouri, laid on the table.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then asked the consent of the House to proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, objected; and gave as a reason the importance of acting on some of the five or six hundred bills on the private calendar.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thereupon moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to, 94 to 39.

So the House resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1838," the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their amendments.

The amendment under consideration was the following clause for appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the current year:

For transportation of mai -	$3,400,000
For compensation of postmasters -	935,000
For ship, steamboat, and way letters -	31,000
For wrapping paper - - -	20,000
For office furniture - - -	6,000
For advertising - - -	25,000
For mail bags - - - -	40,000
For blanks - - - -	36,000
For mail locks and keys and stamps -	9,000
For mail depredations and special agents	12,000
For clerks for offices - - -	140,000
For miscellaneous - - -	40,000

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the following in lieu of the above:

"For transportation of mails, compensation of postmasters, ship, steamboat, and way letters, wrapping paper, office furniture, advertising, mail bags, blanks, mail locks, keys and stamps; mail depredations and special agents, clerks for offices, and miscellaneous expenses, making, according to the estimates of the Department for each branch of these expenditures, an aggregate of four million six hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars; to be paid out of the receipts of the Post Office Department, and charged to that fund, as provided by the third section of the act aforesaid."

Mr. ADAMS opposed the amendment, because he objected to the specification being stricken out. He would not ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to assign a reason for this, because it was understood to be by order of the Postmaster General, and that, he supposed, was sufficient. Mr. A. argued for some time in support of specifying, as the only mode to secure accountability.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio stated that he had mad the inquiry which he had given notice of yesterday, and was now satisfied that the two items he had alluded to ought to be retained in the bill. With regard to the question now before the House, he thought it proper that these appropriations should be specific. Formerly the Postmaster General was accountable for all the expenditures of that Department; but this was found to be an evil, and Congress had determined to take this power from the head of that Department, and have the Post Office fund placed in the Treasury, and then appropriate it as all other appropriations were made. Well, other appropriations were specific, and why was it that this appropriation should not be specific? If this was not done, the act of 1836 was nugatory and of no effect, as it made the head of that Department no more accountable than he was before it was enacted; and if it was not necessary that this appropriation should be specific, it was not necessary that any other appropriation should be specific. His understanding of the act of 1836 was that the Postmaster General should send in his report and estimates, which might be needed for each service in his Department for the coming year, and these should be made the basis of the appropriation in the bill, each item being there specified.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that this item of amendment was in strict pursuance of the act of 1836. He was as much in favor of specific appropriations as the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Ohio, but he considered it singular that in this instance the gentleman from Massachusetts had made such objections to this amendment on the ground of its not being specific, when the whole fund of this department, from the year 1789 to 1836, was at the discretion of the Postmaster General, and could not be affected or controlled by the appropriations of Congress.

During the gentleman's own administration of the affairs of the Government, there had been some twelve or fifteen millions of dollars expended by the Postmaster General without there being any control over it by Congress. He, with the Postmaster General, considered that there was no use in specific appropriations, if the Executive Department could transfer them from one service to another; and this had been done during the Administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, not only with law, but without it; and it was this very individual whom the gentleman now thought proper to speak of with some severity, while Fourth Auditor, who had discovered and exposed this practice. He was as willing that appropriations should be specific as possible, but it was impossible to make these appropriations specific, because there was no telling what each service would cost a year before hand. In the army the salary of every officer was fixed, and consequently it was very easy to make these appropriations specific to the dollar, but this was not the case in the Post Office. No one could tell precisely what the transportation of the mails would cost, and consequently it was impossible to make specific appropriations for this service.

Mr. TILLINGHAST went into an examination of the law of 1836, and the report of the Postmaster General, with a view of showing that that officer was mistaken in saying that this appropriation is gross.

Mr. EWING of Indiana, contended that, by the construction of this amendment, it made an appropriation of $55,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, and moved to strike out the words "for each branch of these expenditures," but the motion was ruled to be out of order.

Mr. REED contended that these appropriations ought to be specific, as this was the only way in which the power of the Postmaster General, which was, in his opinion, by far too great, could be limited.

Mr. RICE GARLAND went into an argument of some length, to show that the act of 1836 required that this appropriation should be specific, and thought it most singular that such a construction should be put upon this act of 1836 as was put upon it by the gentleman from New York and the Postmaster General. He contended that no great inconvenience could result from specific appropriations.

Mr. CONNOR called the attention of the House to the appropriation bill of 1836, immediately after the law passed to place this fund in the Treasury, which made an appropriation in gross of upwards of three millions of dollars, for the expenses of the Post Office Department. This was the construction of the House in relation to this matter, immediately after the passage of the law of 1836. He contended that it was impossible to make this appropriation specific, while appropriations for the other branches of the public service might be specific. Take the item of blanks, and it was impossible to say how many would be needed. Next take the case of the mails, and how was it possible that an appropriation specific for this purpose with any accuracy? They were continually changing, and the expense of them was continually increasing; therefore it was impossible to arrive at accuracy. The Postmaster General was invested with extraordinary power by law, from the necessity of the case. This was discovered to be necessary at an early day, and why was it now that his power should be limited? He considered that some discretion was necessary in relation to this officer, and he trusted the House would not so limit him as to make him incapable of performing his duties in such manner as to be most satisfactory to the whole country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD believed that this was the first time which the attention of the House had been brought to this subject, and it now having been brought to it, in his opinion, it was proper that this appropriation should be made in the same manner in which all other appropriations were made. There was no more reason why this appropriation should not be specific than there was that other appriations should not be, and he trusted the House would adhere to its former practice, and make this appropriation like all others, as this was, in his opinion, the safest and the best mode of proceeding.

Mr. MONTGOMERY referred to the ac of 1836, and stated that, in his opinion, all it required was for the Postmaster General to send in an estimate of the amount which it was expected would be required for the use of his office. Well, this had been done; but why should these specific items be inserted in the appropriation bill? If they were, and one of these appropriations should not be half enough for the service to be performed, what was the consequence? He will not transfer any other appropriation to this service, and the service will be reduced one-half. This might operate very injuriously to some parts of the service of the Department. But if the appropriation was made in gross, he might apply any part of the fund to a service, and keep up that which would be most advantageous to the country. He was at a loss to know why it was that gentleman were so fearful to trust the head of the Post Office Department with the power he had heretofore always exercised. If they had any fear that the expenditures of that Department were not properly made, let them direct the Committee on the Expenditures of that Department, to make an examination into the matter, and lay it before the House. He was perfectly willing that this should be done, but he hoped that officer would not be censured until some evidence of misconduct was discovered. The whole affairs of that Department had, in his opinion, been well managed by the present incumbent, therefore he was opposed to binding him down in the manner in which this specific amendment would bind him down.

Mr. BELL wished to know of the chairman of the Post Office Committee what proportion of the funds of the Post Office Department had actually been paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said there was no document yet on the table which would give this information; a document, however, was expected shortly, which would give it. He himself could not say what was the proportion; but he referred the gentleman from Tennessee to the manner in which the money was placed in the Treasury; and he doubted not he could have all the information which he desired.

Mr. BELL considered that this matter of placing this fund in the Treasury was a mere sham, and that in fact a very small proportion of the money of that Department was ever placed there.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio said, if the gentleman from Tennessee would refer to the report of the Postmaster General accompanying the President's Message, he would there find how this money was placed in the Treasury, and he would there see that a very small proportion of it ever went there. In consequence of the great difficulty and expense of having the funds of that Department transported to Washington, and placed in the Treasury, and then sent to the places where they were needed, a system was adopted of keeping the money in the hands of postmasters and of banks until it was needed, and then paying it out from those banks; and this was, perhaps, the best system which could be adopted. But he found one objection to the manner in which the Postmaster General kept this money, and that was this: that where he had a surplus fund, he ought to place that amount of money in bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, instead of keeping it to his own credit, as was the case now. It appeared, from the report of that officer, that, at the end of the year, he had some hundreds of thousands of dollars of a surplus, and that money was in banks to his credit, and in the hands of postmasters; whereas, in his opinion, it ought to be placed in banks to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. This thing he looked upon as an evil, and hoped it might be remedied.

Mr. CONNOR said we had heard a great deal about this money never being placed in the Treasury, and perhaps the cause of it was that we never had any Treasury to put it in. He trusted, however, that we would shortly have such a Treasury. But the money of the Post Office Department was placed in the Treasury just in the same manner that all other money of the Government was put in the Treasury. All the funds have in fact to pass through the Treasury of the United States, because the Postmaster General does not draw a single draft for five dollars but by sending it to the Treasury Department, and having the signature of the Treasurer thereto. This was the manner in which the money passed through the Treasury, and this was the only way that it could be managed without the greatest inconvenience and loss. He trusted, therefore, it would not hereafter be said that this money never went into the Treasury, when it went there in the very manner provided for by the law of 1836.

Mr. HAYNES said it was due to the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] and to himself, as well as to the Postmaster General, to explain a remark made by him yesterday in reference to the compensation to clerks in the post offices throughout the United States. Called somewhat unexpectedly into the discussion, he had then said that he thought it probable that, in consequence of the passage of the act of July, 1836, reorganizing the Post Office Department, it might have happened, that in preparing the detailed estimate of appropriation for the service of the year to commence on the first of July next, the Postmaster General had discovered that clerks had been employed in offices not entitled to them. He had since looked into the matter, and ascertained that there were but about fifty post offices, he believed the precise number was fifty-one, at which clerks had been employed, and he believed they were all such as, by the amount of compensation to the postmasters, allowed the employment of clerks. He had a rough estimate of the aggregate amount which had been disbursed within the last post office year among all the clerks in the fifty-one offices, and found it to be a gross sum of about $175,000; so that the appropriation proposed in the bill would reduce the expenditure in this branch of the service about thirty-five thousand dollars.

He said he would now proceed to the subject immediately before the House. When it is considered that the thoughts and feelings of men are as diversified as their features, it cannot be a cause of surprise that we have heard such a variety of interpretations of the act of July, 1836, for the reorganization of the Post Office Department. By applying the well-known rule of construction to that act, the rule which requires such an interpretation of a statute as shall give effect and operation to all its parts, he did not think it would be difficult to reconcile the contrariety of opinions which had been expressed upon the meaning of that act. By the first section, all moneys arising from collections under the administration of the Post Office Department, are required to be placed in the Treasury of the United States. By the second section, it is provided that disbursements shall be made under the specific heads embraced in the amendment now under consideration.

By the third section it is required "that the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department," in each year, shall be appropriated out of the revenue of the Department, and that all payments of the receipts into the Treasury, shall be to the credit of the said appropriation.

The obvious import of this section is, that the appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department shall be made in an "aggregate sum," and that the Treasury shall open a single account with it as such, as has been well said by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] By any other construction of the act of July, 1836, already referred to, the third section would be entirely ineffective and nugatory, when to the Treasury Department it is direct and imperative in its plainest intent and meaning. The opposite construction of the act referred to must have been erroneously drawn from those portions of the second and twenty-third sections, requiring the Postmaster General to make to Congress an annual report "of the amounts actually expended" under the specific heads therein set forth.

It must be obvious, that upon a fair comparison, neither the second nor twenty-third section conflicts in any respect with the provisions of the third, and that they are entirely consistent with the view which he had presented.

In the discussion upon the amendment now under consideration, it had been treated as a proposition to make a gross appropriation without any specification whatever. This is not so, for as much as it specifies every head of disbursement authorized by the act of July, 1836.

It is, therefore, a specific proposition, but not specific as the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, as it does not set apart and define the precise sum to be expended under each separate head. But how could the appropriation be made more specific, without endangering the operations of a Department so subject to constant change and extension as the Post Office Department is so well known to be, in all its branches of expenditure?

This inconvenience and embarrassment can only be prevented, by entrusting the head of that Department with an extent of discretionary power, which it would be manifestly improper to confide to any other department of the Government.

It may well be a question in what mode such discretionary power may be most safely, and, at the same time, most conveniently, confided. In the amendment under consideration, not only is the act of 1836 complied with, but the necessary discretion conferred in a manner most consistent with the operations of the department. The appropriation might be made with the specifications contained in the original amendment, coupled with an aggregate sum for contingencies, according as the expenditure under either specification may overrun the sum specially appropriated; or authority might be conferred on the Postmaster General to make transfers from one head of appropriation to another, as the exigencies of the public service may require; but either mode would confer upon that officer an equal measure of discretion. But as the mode proposed in the amendment was, in his opinion, the most convenient, and, at the same time, in strict conformity to the provisions of the act of 1836, it had his decided preference. He was sure that all the advantage to be expected from the most specific form of appropriation which could be devised, would be secured by that requirement of the act of 1836, which makes it the duty of the Postmaster General to give an annual account of his disbursements under each head specified in that act.

Mr. ROBERTSON wished the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to furnish the House with the specifications of the item for contingent or miscellanous expenditures, because, if that gentlemen could not do so, Mr. R. should move to strike it out.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that the gentleman himself must be aware, that when the Departments estimated for contingencies, it was because they could not specify the items; and if they could not, how could it be expected that the Committee of Ways and Means could do so?

To meet the objection of the gentleman from Indiana. Mr. C. modified his amendment, by striking from it the word "each."

Mr. ROBERTSON said then, as the gentleman could furnish no explanation, he moved to strike out the item for miscellaneous expenses.

The CHAIR stated that the amendment was not then in order.

Mr. HARLAN drew the attention of the gentleman to the fact that eight more clerks were employed in the Post Office Department, than were authorized by the law of 1836.

Mr. ROBERTSON did not know whether that extra clerk hire covered this miscellaneous item or not.

Mr. McKAY referred to a subsequent law, passed last session, authorizing the appointment of an additional number of clerks for the office of the Auditor, and that of the Postmaster General. Mr. McK. was as anxious as any other gentleman to make the appropriations for this Department specific, if the same authority to make transfers, from one head of expenditures to another, that was possessed by the Heads of the other Departments; but this was expressly prohibited, or not given, by the law of 1836.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on Mr. CAMBRELENG'S amendment; which were ordered, and were—yeas 64, nays 66.

So the amendment was rejected; and the question recurring on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the item for miscellaneous expenses: lost.

The original amendment was then concurred in.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then rose and expressed a hope that the House would order this bill to be engrossed to night, and, as the Committee of Ways and Means would, it being the long session, report a supplementary bill, gentlemen who had amendments to offer he hoped would defer doing so till that bill came up.

Mr. RARIDEN then moved to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to increase the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House from $225,000 to $273,960, [so as to embrace the books distributed to the members.]

On taking the question, it resulted as follows: ayes 61, noes 58—no quorum.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said as this motion, if it prevailed, would postpone the bill for two months, it was desirable to have a full House; and he therefore moved a call of the House.

Mr. BRONSON inquired what the gentleman meant by saying the bill would be postponed for two months, if this amendment should be adopted?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, because the Senate never had concurred in that amendment; and, in all probability, never would.

The motion for a call of the House was disagreed to.

Mr. BOND then asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. RARIDEN'S motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, as this was a question involving the delay of this important bill, he moved the House adjourn, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. BELL, who, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House, at as early a day as may be found practicable, the amount of Treasury notes issued under the authority of the act of the last session of Congress, and the amount of the same which has been received in payment of the public dues up to this time; also the amount of moneys received on account of the customs, and the public lands, during the last quarter of the year 1837, and during the first quarter of the present year, so far as the quarterly returns, or other information in possession of the Department, may show; also, what amount of moneys, of every description, available for the public service, now in the Treasury, or in the hands of receivers, liable to draft, and at what points deposited.

Mr. BELL then renewed the motion to adjourn, and, it prevailing,

The House adjourned.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill; and after a debate in which Messrs. SOUTHARD, WALL, TIPTON, and CLAY took part,

Mr. KING moved to amend the 23d section of the bill, (gradually prohibiting the Government from receiving banks notes at all,) by placing the beginning of this gradual process in 1839, instead of 1838, simply delaying the process one year.

This amendment was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Gundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—42.

Mr. TIPTON then offered the following, as an amendment, to come in as the 23d section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, upon the sales of public lands or otherwise, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable, and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States. No such duties, taxes, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States.

After a debate, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. TIPTON and RIVES, and opposed by Messrs. BUCHANAN, SEVIER, BENTON, and WALKER, the question was taken on Mr. TIPTON'S motion, and it was rejected—yeas 22, nays 30, as follows:

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted an amendment in lieu of the 23d section, which was stricken out, providing that it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make, or continue in force, any general order which shall make any difference as to the money or medium of payment in which the debts or dues to the Government, accruing in either branch of the revenue, may be paid or discharged.

After some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, CALHOUN, WEBSTER, WALKER, and KING,

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER, by adding the following:

"Nor shall there be any difference as to the credit or time of payment which shall be allowed between the sales of public lands and the payment of duties on imports, or in the kind of security which shall be required."

After some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, KING, and BUCHANAN,

Mr. YOUNG suggested a modification of Mr. BENTON'S motion, which was accepted by the latter, as follows:

"Provided that the amount receivable in payment of the customs, and all other public dues, shall be paid in cash, as in the case of the sales of the public lands."

After some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, WALKER, BUCHANAN, and DAVIS,

The question was taken on Mr. BENTON'S motion as modified by Mr. YOUNG, and it was rejected—yeas 8, nays 43, as follows:

Reports from committees were then called for.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Milligan; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. TALIAFERRO reported a bill for the relief of Wm. Mattison.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, the House took up the Senate's amendment to the bill in relation to the United States Courts in Western Virginia, and, on Mr. G's motion, after a few words from him and Messrs. BEIRNE and MALLORY, it was disagreed to.

The House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the names of the deposite banks, which had availed themselves of the benefits of the act of the 12th of October last, which was laid on the table.

Sundry bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

The bill to provide for the construction of the Cumberland road through the towns of Salem and Louisburg, in the State of Ohio, was read the third time and passed.

CIVIL LIST.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1838," the question being on the motion of Mr. RARIDEN to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to increase the item for the contingent expenses of the House from $225,000 to $273,960, (so as to cover the purchase of certain books to be distributed among the members.)

Mr. RARIDEN moved a call of the House: refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina opposed the proposed appropriation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG raised the point of order under the 63d rule.

The CHAIR ruled it to be in order.

Mr. CAMBRELENG took an appeal.

The 63d rule is in the following words: "No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law;" and under this rule, Mr. C. contended, no law having been passed authorizing this appropriation, it was not in order as an amendment.

There was also another ground of objection taken by Mr. C. Since the year 1830, the House had invariably adopted a proviso prohibiting the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the House, from being applied to any other purpose than its ordinary expenditures.

There was also another objection. The amendment embraced an appropriation contained in another special bill before the House.

THE CHAIR reaffirmed his decision, on the ground that the amendment contained nothing from which he could be justified in drawing an inference that it contemplated to purchase of books.

Mr. HOWARD hoped the gentleman would withdraw the appeal.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did so for the purpose of having a direct vote on the proposition. If it was agreed to, he was still of the opinion that the bill would be delayed till July, for the Senate had always withheld its consent to such an appropriation, and the Chair and the House must take the responsibility of its delay, for the Committee of Ways and Means could not.

Mr. CUSHMAN, in order, he said, to bring the House to a vote, moved the previous question, but the House did not second it, only 47 voting for it.

The question on Mr. RARIDEN's motion was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 96.

So the motion to commit was decided in the negative.

Mr. REED then renewed the amendment moved by him in Committee of the Whole, for building, rebuilding, and completing light-houses in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, $52,040.

Mr. INGHAM moved to amend this amendment, as follows:

"Next after the word "completing" in the second line of the amendment proposed by Mr. REED, insert light-houses, monuments, and beacon lights, as follows:"

In Maine.—For placing monuments on Fort Point ledge, Adams's ledge, and Buck ledge, in Penobscot river, $1,300, in addition to the sum of $3,000, appropriated by act of 3d March, 1837.

In Massachusetts.—For two small beacon lights on the north side of Nantucket island, in addition to the sum of $500 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $2,100.

For a light house on Mayo beach, in Well Fleet bay, in addition to $1,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $4,000.

In Connecticut.—For rebuilding the light-house at Lynde Point, in addition to the sum of $5,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $1,200.

For a sea wall to preserve the light-house at Fair Weather island, in addition to the sum of $5,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $3,000.

In New York.—For placing a beacon on Romers shoal, near Sandy Hook, in addition to the sum of $15,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $10,000.

For a light-house on Esopus Meadows, on the Hudson river, in addition to $3,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $3,000.

For a light-house on Cedar Island, Sag Harbor, in addition to $1,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $4,000.

In Ohio.—For securing the foundation of the light-house on Turtle Island, in addition to $8,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $7,000.

In Louisiana.—For a beacon-light at or near the south-east pass of Vermilion Bay, in addition to the sum of $5,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $10,000.

In Michigan.—For a light-house at the mouth of Kalamazoo river, in addition to the sum of $5,000, heretofore appropriated the sum of $1,000.

In Wisconsin Territory.—For a light-house at the mouth of Milwaukie, in addition to $5,000, heretofore appropriated, the sum of $1,000.

For a light-house at the mouth of Manitonic river, in addition to $5,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $1,000.

For a light-house at Chippewayan, in addition to $5,000 heretofore appropriated, the sum of $1,000.

For a light-house at the mouth of Root river, in addition to the sum of $5,000, heretofore appropriated, the sum of $1,000.

Mr. REED accepted this as a modification.

The amendment was discussed by Messrs. REED, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, INGHAM, in its support, and by Mr. CAMBRELENG in opposition to it.

Mr. CUSHMAN then rose and said he hoped the House would not adopt this amendment, and, in order to cut it off, he moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House—ayes 72, noes 57.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, but they were refused, and the main question was ordered, and then put and agreed to without a division; so the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

The bill having been engrossed in the interim, was put on its third reading.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana then moved to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to strike from it all the clauses for additional clerk hire.

Upon this question Mr. G. after some few remarks, called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG gave a detailed statement of the items, which he showed to be in consequence of the necessity of carrying out laws passed by Congress. A law was passed, to execute which the head of a department or bureau was compelled to employ additional clerk hire, and it was better to provide for this additional force temporarily, or as long the duties under the law were necessary, than to authorize the appointment of permanent clerks, who might have nothing to do when the law ceased. It was with this view that the Committee of Ways and Means had reported these items, and they had rigidly investigated each case.

Mr. GARLAND withdrew a part of his instructions, but he still contended that the discretion assumed by the Departments in these extra appointments should be further restrained. They should not be permitted to be the sole judges whether additional clerks were necessary or not, and the object of his motion was to restrain them from the irresponsible exercise of that power.

Mr. CONNOR then demanded the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 69, noes 57, and the main question ordered, put, and agreed to without a division.

So the bill was passed.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

Mr. GOODE, on leave, yesterday presented a petition from certain citizens in the vicinity of Salem, in Montgomery county, and Lewisburg, in Preble county, Ohio, praying that the superintendent of the National road in Ohio may be authorized to examine and resurvey that part of said road, so as to run through Salem and Lewisburg, if it proves to be a good location, and it is practicable without a material increase of distance, or any increase of expense.

Mr. Goode accompanied the petition with the following statement in substance: That the object of this petition was not to open the old question of change of the National road, but for the single purpose of authorizing an examination of the route through Salem and Lewisburg, and for no other purpose whatever; and that the bill (should a bill be reported) will be confined to that object alone, without permitting any other deviation from the road as at present located; and if it cannot be passed at the present session, so as to cause no delay, the bill is to be withdrawn at the close of this session, so as not to retard the progress of the work.

CHEROKEE TREATY.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented a memorial, addressed to Congress, and signed by the deputation of the Cherokee Indians now in Washington, making representations and complaints in regard to their situation under the late alleged treaty, and praying Congress in some mode to interfere for their relief.

Also, a memorial against the enforcement of the treaty, directly from the Cherokee nation, with the signatures of 15,665 persons of that nation.

Mr. S. moved that these memorials be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, I must express my deep regret at the introduction of this subject here by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Southard.] Even to entertain, and discuss this subject here, at this time, is pregnant with much mischief. But the subject being thus far forced upon the attention of the Senate, I wish to give to it that direction which will be productive of the least mischief, which will be, to lay the whole subject on the table, with an understanding that it will not again be taken up by the Senate.

It is proper, however, that, before I make this motion, I should ask the ear of the Senate, while I explain, in a brief manner, why the Senate should, in a prompt and decisive manner, put to rest all hopes and expectations of the Cherokee people, that John Ross can effect the slightest change in the determination of any branch of the Federal Government, to execute the Cherokee treaty of 1835. Neither would I wish to make this motion to the preclusion of other gentlemen who may desire to say something on this subject.

Sir, this Cherokee treaty, which is the subject matter of complaint with John Ross and his friends, who are now in hearing of my voice, was negotiated by a highly qualified and competent delegation of the Cherokee people, in the latter part of the year 1835. In the early part of the year 1836, the treaty was thoroughly discussed in this Senate, and received its ratification in due form. Moreover, the large appropriations necessary to carry it into effect were discussed in both branches of Congress, in the face of the opposition of Mr. Ross and his political friends, and received the sanction of Congress. From that time, the execution of the treaty commenced, and has progressed with as much success as could be expected, under all the opposing circumstances. Mr. Ross and his associates have not been able to keep back the intelligent portion of the Cherokee people from acceding to the terms of the treaty, and becoming recipients under its provisions. Yes, sir, nine-tenths of the intelligent Cherokees have emigrated to the West under the provisions of this treaty, or are preparing to go.

Amongst the emigrants, you will find Andrew Ross, the brother of John; Thomas F. Taylor, the son of Richard Taylor, who is now here as one of John Ross's delegation; and John Gunter, the brother of the Gunters who are now here aiding John Ross in his projects of mischief. Yes, sir, the nearest and most of the connections of these very men have not only yielded to this treaty, and are now settled in the West, happy and contented, but have corresponded with me, and assured me of their satisfaction with their change of residence.

Indeed, sir, they are now zealous friends of the treaty, although, at the time of its formation, Taylor and others were violently opposed to it.

There is no difficulty in regard to executing this treaty with the intelligent portion of the Cherokee people, except what has been produced by this man John Ross, who claims to be principal chief of the Cherokee people, and his pliable delegation now here. The opposing Indians, now, are ignorant and uninformed, and these would long since have cheerfully yielded, and have emigrated, but for the wicked and mischievous operations of this man John Ross, and his immediate associates.

Since the ratification of the treaty, I presume this man Ross has spent more than one-half of his time in and about this place, under the pretence of doing something which would abrogate or change this treaty. Unfortunately, he has been permitted to hold too much correspondence with the Executive officers of this Government, and received too much countenance from members of Congress, which has been calculated to keep up the delusion that the treaty would not be executed without his consent or approbation. Sir, I have been intimately connected with this subject. I have been in a position, in connection with the execution of this treaty, which enables me to understand things as they actually exist; and but for this man Ross, and his aiders and abettors, these unfortunate Cherokees would now have been quietly enjoying the benefits of this most liberal and beneficent treaty at their settled homes in the West. Hundreds and thousands of these people are this day passively waiting to receive the permission of Ross to leave their present abodes and go West. Whole neighborhoods of the Cherokees have repeatedly made up their minds to yield to the treaty, and commenced making their preparations accordingly, when news would go from John Ross and his associates here, that Ross was negotiating a new treaty; that the present treaty was undergoing modification or change, and the Indians urged not to yield to the present treaty or to the advice of the agents of the Government engaged in its execution; and thus repeated stops have been put to emigration.

The countenance given to this delusion by Congressmen and those high in authority, is fraught with the most serious evils. It threatens destruction and extermination to the remnant of this once mighty race. The twenty-third of May next, now less than two months hence, and these people, so far as Georgia is concerned, must go, and go quickly. The citizens of Georgia hold grants for the lands on which these Indians now reside in that State, and the grantees are legally authorized by the laws of the State, as well as the treaty, to take possession of their lands on and after the twenty-third of May next; and, sir, possession they will take, and the Indians will then truly be forced out of house and home. Georgia and the Georgians have long since been accused of having taken possession of all the Indian lands, houses and homes. But, sir, this was not true; it was one of the many slanders which has been propagated to disparage the State which I have the honor to represent. We have treated the Indians with all the kindness and forbearance which their interest required. But, sir, whatever conflict may arise, after the 23d of May, Georgia must, and will, be speedily relieved from this long-standing and vexatious perplexity. If the execution of this treaty is longer resisted, whatever evil may ensue, the just responsibility is chargeable to this man, Ross, and his associates, and to those who encourage his delusive hopes, and not to my constituents, or the authorities of the State which I represent. So far from avoiding, I would desire the most thorough investigation of this treaty, its execution, and every other transaction connected with the subject. But, sir, I will never consent to any investigation which shall retard the execution of the treaty, so far as the removal of the Indians is concerned. They must go, or evil will come of it.

I have in my possession various communications from officers and agents of the Government, as well as other citizens, all going to sustain the fact that the Indians will not emigrate, so long as this man, Ross, continues to communicate (or causes it to be done) that he is doing, or expects to do, something here to change the provisions of the treaty. From the beginning, nothing but the fallacious hope that this treaty would not be strictly executed, has prevented the Cherokee people from yielding to it with great unanimity. This subject is not now within the jurisdiction of Congress; it belongs to the Executive Government; and if this treaty fails of execution, to that branch of the Government I shall charge the failure, and shall use my best exertions to prevent the interference of the Legislature—that branch of the Government to which I happen to be attached. But all the combined powers of the Federal Government cannot abrogate or change this treaty, without the consent of the States interested, and that consent will never be obtained. Honesty is said to be the best policy: at any rate, honesty is a duty. Then let us not deceive, but save these people, by assuring them that the treaty will be executed.

I will forbear, as before intimated, to make the motion to lay this memorial on the table, to afford to other gentlemen the privilege which I have exercised myself, of submitting any remarks which they may have to make on this subject. I shall not, however, consent to give any other direction to this subject than that which I have suggested.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that, in order to understand fully the merits of the memorial presented by the Senator from New Jersey, he would lay before the Senate, and ask the reading of, certain documents which had a most important bearing on the subject before them. The first was a letter from General Smith, the superintendent of Cherokee emigration, received at the War Department, and dated the 8th March, by which the Senate would see what he thought of the matter. He was in possession of other documents, which he should ask to be read, after the Senate had heard this one.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he would also ask for the reading of the papers he had presented, in order that the whole subject, in relation to this matter, might be fully understood. It was not his wish, when he presented the memorial, to excite debate, but rather his desire that the motion should have pursued a very different course. As merely to have printed the memorial and accompanying documents, and to have referred the whole to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which would, no doubt, have reported on the subject, and put the matter at once to rest.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied, that under all the circumstances, he could not suffer himself to be diverted from asking the reading of these documents, for reasons which would be apparent to the Senate, when they became acquainted with the contents. Having understood, on Saturday last, that the Senator from New Jersey intended to offer this memorial, which amounted to little more than turning loose the tomahawk and scalping knife on a portion of the people he represented, he went on that morning to the War Department, for the purpose of obtaining information on the subject, and was furnished with these documents, which he was under an obligation to return in the course of the day. The Senate would, therefore, see his object in requesting that they might be immediately read. He should then make a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, in order to prevent any excitement, and put an end to any delusive hopes of setting aside the treaty which would inevitably lead to the most dangerous consequences.

Mr. KING could not but regret that his honorable colleague was not prepared to accede to the suggestion made, and suffer this matter to rest without a discussion. He knew, and every Senator knew, full well, that if any discussion was had here on the subjects treated of in this memorial, they would create hopes in the minds of these people, which never could be realized, while the false hopes thus created would probably result in the most serious disturbances. They all knew the care, the labor, and deliberation bestowed in the investigation of the subject, and the difficulties they had to encounter when the treaty was ratified. It was ratified by the solemn vote of two-thirds of this body, and concurred in by the House of Representatives, by the passage of an appropriation bill to carry it into effect. If then, said Mr. K. when this treaty is about to be carried into effect, we create in the minds of these people, the hopes and fears that must result from a discussion of the subjects embraced in their memorial, you greatly injure them, as well as endanger the peace and tranquillity of our people. The Cherokees ought to be made to understand that this thing was settled forever; that the treaty was irrevocable; that the Government was bound to carry it into effect, and that they must not delude themselves with the false hope of setting it aside.

He felt for this unfortunate people as much as any man. He knew that they were deluded and deceived by those of their own nation who were fully aware that there was not the remotest possibility of diverting the Government from its solemn obligations to carry out the provisions of this treaty. He had received much information on this subject from individuals of the Cherokee tribe, who were every way equal, if not superior, to these memorialists—honest, intelligent, and religious men, and who were convinced that the true interests of their people consisted in their removal to the West. He had hopes that his honorable colleague would have acceded to the proposition that this matter should be laid on the table without discussion, without printing, and without reference. He asked honorable Senators, as men of understanding, of patriotism and of humanity, to show by their votes to these unfortunate people, that all expectation of setting aside, or changing this treaty, must be abandoned, now and forever.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that if his colleague had thought proper to wait for the development of his views, he would have seen that the very course he intended to pursue was the one recommended by him. It was his intention, as soon as the documents were read, to move to lay the whole subject on the table, in order to prevent any discussion on it; and he would do this for the security not only of his own constituents, but for the security of those deluded people, the Cherokees themselves. He was in possession of information which his colleague was not aware of, that would be sufficient to satisfy the Senate of the propriety of putting an end at once to any action on this subject. His purpose was to produce no excitement, to permit no reference to a committee, or give rise to any agitating discussion. On the contrary, his object was to avoid all this; and he thought that the readiest way of doing so, was to let the reading of the documents precede his intended motion to lay the whole subject on the table, He knew as well as his colleague did, that any discussion would only tend to encourage false hopes in the minds of these unfortunate people, and involve that section of the country in war, and that they would, by any such action, as proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, bring about the re-enactment of the scenes we had recently witnessed in the Florida and Creek wars. If the Florida treaty had been promptly carried into effect, as it ought to have been, without suffering the false hopes of remaining in the country, which had arisen out of a most unfortunate delay, we should, in all probability, have avoided that expensive war, and all the bloodshed that was consequent upon it. So also as to the Creek war. If a competent force had been stationed amongst them to control them, and they had been promptly removed, all the bloodshed and expense, together with a destruction of private property to an immense amount, would also have been avoided.

Mr. C. said as he was desired by several Senators near him to state the contents of the documents he referred to, he would do so as briefly as possible; and he hoped that it would be sufficient to put down the discussion at once, and indicate distinctly to these deluded people that there was no disposition on the part of this Government to delay the execution of the treaty. The superintendent stated, what was corroborated by the three commissioners, in their letters of the 9th January and 28th February last, that these people say that they are ready to go West immediately, if they had the permission of John Ross to do so; that they are waiting the issue of his negotiations with the Government, which they believe will result in their being permitted to remain in the country. It all, said Mr. C. amounts to this: that they are kept in the country under the delusive expectation held out by John Ross, that he can succeed in effecting such a negotiation as will annul the treaty. Again, said Mr. C. there is not sufficient force in that section of country now to remove the Indians without bloodshed, if these delusive expectations held out by Ross are permitted to continue; and although a war would be most unfortunate to our people, yet it would be a still greater scourge to the Cherokees. It would result in their extermination. Their security consisted in putting an end to the false hopes that had been held out to them. Mr. C. said he would send the documents to the Chair, that any gentleman who wished it might have an opportunity of inspecting them. He then moved to lay the memorial on the table, but withdrew the motion temporarily at the request of

Mr. SOUTHARD, who did not wish to enter into any controversy on the subject: the two Senators did not feel more regret than he did on this matter. The motion he had just made, as well as the conversations he had held with different individuals, would show he had no desire to force it upon the consideration of the Senate, with a view to a protracted discussion. These persons, claiming to be authorized agents, had put in his hands the memorial and papers containing the correspondence between the Executive and these people. He had felt it, therefore, a solemn duty to present it to the Senate. The Indians believe, whether justly or not, they had been wrongly dealt with, and ask Congress to hear them. Why not then, said Mr. S. refer the papers to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which body would, no doubt, report promptly, and let them know what they had to expect. Such, in his opinion, would be the true course for a great Government to pursue towards a poor and oppressed race. Give the answer to their prayer in a constitutional manner, and they will, no doubt, be satisfied. If you refuse them a hearing, said Mr. S. do you suppose that would destroy their hopes of remaining? No sir! no sir!—it will not. If the papers had been permitted to have taken the course he proposed, he would not have opened his mouth on the subject; but when it was sought to lay the documents on the table, without a hearing, or any understanding in the case, he would feel perfectly justified in going into this matter, and ascertaining whether these people had not been imposed upon. He felt for them because he believed them an injured and a wronged people, and that it was an imperious duty he owed to himself, to them, and to the country, to defend them with zeal. It was because he was reluctant to go into this subject that he proposed to refer it to the committee he had named; which, in his opinion, was the wisest course that could be pursued. That committee could make its report promptly, even in five lines, if it were necessary; so that he might send it to them, and let them know what was the final resolve of Government in relation to them. If, however, it was the determination of the Senate to lay this subject on the table, and refuse a hearing to these unfortunate people, he, for one, must be permitted to record his vote against it.

Mr. GRUNDY made some remarks in relation to these papers, objecting to refer them to the Committee on Indian Affairs; though he had as much confidence in that committee as any other. He thought the Indians would as well understand the motion to lay the memorial on the table to be definite, as though it were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Mr. G. renewed his motion to lay it on the table, but withdrew it in order to give his colleague [Mr. WHITE] an opportunity of presenting his views.

Mr. WHITE made some remarks, which were not distinctly heard. He was understood, however, to maintain that all communications to the Government from foreign nations, or from tribes of Indians with whom treaties had been held, should be made through the Executive branch of the Government.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was perfectly satisfied, that if the subject was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, it would not only be well examined, but promptly acted on, and in a way to produce as little excitement as possible. His object was to cut off at once the possibility of misrepresentation which might lead these deluded people to a course most unfortunate for themselves. He would not add another word, further than to say that his object in making the motion, which he now made, to lay the whole subject on the table, was to put the subject down definitively; and he wished, also, that those who were friendly to the objects of the memorial, would communicate frankly to the memorialists that there was not the slightest hope of diverting the Government from its intention to carry this treaty into effect.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the whole subject was laid on the table—yeas 36, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—36.

Mr. McKEAN moved to postpone the bill until the first Monday of December next, and asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 23, nays 29, as follows:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That all collectors and receivers of public money, of every character and description, within the District of Columbia, shall, as frequently as they may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury so to do, pay over to the Treasurer of the United States at the Treasury thereof, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of Philadelphia and New Orleans, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the Treasurers of the Mints in their respective cities, at the said mints, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; and that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the receivers general of public money in their respective cities, at their offices respectively, all the public moneys collected by them, or in their hands, to be safely kept, by the said respective depositaries, until otherwise disposed of according to law; and it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to direct such payments, by the said collectors and receivers, at all the said places, at least as often as once in each month, and as much more frequently, in all cases, as he, in his discretion, may think proper.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the Treasury of the United States; to the Mint at Philadelphia; to the Branch

Mint at New Orleans; or to the offices of either of the receivers general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary constituted by this act to any other depositary constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the moneys in the hands, care, and custody, of any of the depositaries constituted by this act, shall be considered and held as deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be, at all times, subject to his draft, whether made for transfer or disbursement, in the same manner as though the said moneys were actually in the Treasury of the United States; and each depositary shall make returns to the Treasury Department of all moneys received and paid by him, at such times, and in such form, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That whenever public moneys shall accumulate in the hands of any depositary constituted by this act, other than the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans, and the receivers general of public money, to an amount beyond that secured by the bond of the officer, or which the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for any cause, consider unsafe, and it shall not be desirable to transfer the moneys so accumulated to any other depositary, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary to direct the said moneys, or any portion thereof, to be specially deposited in such bank of the State, or Territory, wherein the depositary who is to make the deposite is located, as he, the said Secretary, shall select and name: Provided, The bank so selected will agree to receive and keep the moneys deposited with it upon the terms and conditions in the next section of this act prescribed.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the special deposites of the public moneys authorized by the last preceding section of this act to be made in banks, shall be made upon the following terms and conditions, and upon no other, namely:

First. All such deposites shall be strictly special deposites; and the banks holding them shall be prohibited, in the most effectual manner, from making any use of the moneys deposited, by way of loans, discounts, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whatsoever; and to secure the fulfilment of this condition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to furnish the banks selected as deposite banks with safes for the keeping of the public moneys exclusively, and under the joint control of the bank and some designated officer of the Government, or to adopt such other guards as he shall prefer.

Second. Nothing but gold or silver, or such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed by law to be received in payment of the public dues, shall be offered for deposite, or received by the bank as a deposite, under the provisions of this act.

Third. All deposites shall be passed, upon the books of the bank, to the credit of the depositary making the same; but no moneys deposited in pursuance of this act shall be withdrawn without the express order of the Secretary of the Treasury for the payment; and no drafts of the Treasurer of the United States, or orders or warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, for ordinary transfer or disbursement, shall be made upon any bank selected as a deposite bank under this act.

Fourth. A commission, such as shall be agreed upon between the Secretary of the Treasury and the bank, not in any case to exceed one eighth of one per centum upon the moneys deposited with it, shall be allowed and paid by the United States, in full satisfaction of all claims on the part of the bank for trouble and risk growing out of the receipt, safe keeping, and repayment of the special deposites herein authorized to be made; all accounts for commissions to be audited and paid at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That, in case no bank within the State or Territory wherein the depositary, directed to make deposites, is located, will consent to receive the moneys of the Government upon special deposite, according to the foregoing conditions and regulations, then it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to select some bank in an adjoining State, or Territory, such as may be most convenient for the officer to make deposites, and the public service; and in case no convenient bank of either character can be found willing to receive such deposites upon the terms proposed, the Secretary may transfer the same to the Treasury of the United States, to the Mint, or Branch Mints, or to the offices of either of the receivers general of public money, as shall be most convenient to the depositary from whom the money is to be transferred, or to the wants of the public service in reference to disbursements.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause examinations to be made of the books, accounts, and money on hand, of the several depositaries constituted by this act; and for that purpose to appoint special agents, as occasion may require, with such compensation as he may think reasonable, to be fixed and declared at the time of each appointment, which said examinations, in all cases where the sum on hand usually exceeds three-fourths of the amount of the officer's bond, shall not be made less frequently than once in each year, and as much more frequently, in those and all other cases, as the Secretary, in his discretion, shall direct. The agents selected to make these examinations shall be instructed to examine as well the books, accounts, and returns of the officer, as the money on hand, and the manner of its being kept, to the end that uniformity and accuracy in the accounts, as well as safety to the public moneys, may be secured thereby.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the examinations provided for in the last preceding section, and as a further guard over the public moneys, it shall be the duty of each naval officer and surveyor, as a check upon the receiver general of public moneys, or collector of the customs, of their respective districts; of each register of a land office, as a check upon the receiver of his land office; and of the director and superintendent of each Mint and Branch Mint when separate offices, as a check upon the Treasurers, respectively, of the said Mints, or the persons acting as such, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, of the receivers general of public money, collectors, receivers of land offices, Treasurers, and persons acting as such, and to make a full, accurate, and faithful return to the Treasury Department of their condition.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said officers respectively, whose duty it is made by this act to receive, keep, and disburse the public moneys, as the fiscal agents of the Government, may be allowed any necessary additional expenses for clerks, fire-proof chests, or vaults, or other necessary expenses of safe keeping, transferring, and disbursing said moneys: all such expenses of every character to be first expressly authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, whose directions upon all the above subjects, by way of regulation and otherwise, are to be strictly followed by all the said officers: Provided, That the whole number of clerks to be appointed by virtue of this section of this act, shall not exceed ten, and that the aggregate compensations of the whole number shall not exceed eight thousand dollars, nor shall the compensation of any one clerk, so appointed, exceed eight hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with as much promptitude as the convenience of the public business and the safety of the public funds will permit, withdraw the balances remaining with the present depositaries of the public moneys, and confine the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of those moneys to the depositaries established by this act.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That all marshals, district attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees, wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury, to the Treasurer of either of the Mints, in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the receivers general of public money, or to such other depositary constituted by this act as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in other parts of the United States, to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposite therefor.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That all officers charged by this act with the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, are hereby required to keep an accurate entry of each sum received, and of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made; and that if any one of the said officers shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys intrusted to him for safe-keeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a high misdemeanor, and any officer or person convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than two, nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That, until the rooms, offices, vaults, and safes, directed by the first four sections of this act to be constructed and prepared for the use of the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurers of the Mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, and the receivers general of public money at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, can be constructed and prepared for use, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to procure suitable rooms for offices for those officers at their respective locations, and to contract with such banks, incorporations, or individuals, as may be willing to contract for such use of their vaults and safes as may be required for the safe-keeping of the public moneys in the charge and custody of those officers respectively, the expense to be paid by the United States.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to make or continue in force, any general order, which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds or medium of payment, in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them, respectively, shall be presented for payment; and, in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the receivers general of public moneys directed by this act to be appointed, shall receive, respectively, the following salaries, per annum, to be paid quarter yearly, at the Treasury of the United States, to wit: the receiver general of public money at New York shall be paid a salary of three thousand dollars per annum; the receiver general of public money at Boston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; the receiver general of public money at Charleston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the receiver general of public money at St. Louis, shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and these salaries, respectively, shall be in full for the services of the respective officers; nor shall either of them be permitted to charge, or receive, any commission, pay, or perquisite, for any official service, of any character or description whatsoever; and the making of any such charge, or the receipt of any such compensation, is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, for which the officer convicted thereof, before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be subject to punishment by fine, or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court before which the offence shall be tried.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive at the Treasury, and at such other points as he may designate, payments in advance for public lands, the payments so made, in all cases, to be evidenced by the receipt of the said Treasurer of the United States; which receipts so given shall be current at the several land offices of the United States, as cash, at any public or private sale of lands, in the same manner as the currency authorized by law to be received in payment for the public lands. Provided, however, That the receipts given by the Treasurer of the United States, pursuant to the authority conferred in this section, shall not be negotiable or transferrable, by delivery, or assignment, or in any other manner whatsoever, but shall, in all cases, be presented in payment for lands by or for the person to whom the receipt was given; as shown upon its face.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That for the purchase of sites, and for the construction of the offices of the receivers general of public money, by this act directed, to be erected at Charleston, South Carolina, and at St. Louis, Missouri, there shall be and hereby is, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby required to adopt plans for the said offices, and the vaults and safes connected therewith, and to cause the same to be constructed and prepared for use with as little delay as shall be consistent with the public interests, and the convenient location and security of the buildings to be erected: Provided, however, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall find, upon inquiry and examination, that suitable rooms for the use of the receiver general at Charleston can be obtained in the custom-house now owned by the United States at that place, and that secure vaults and safes can be constructed in that building for the safe-keeping of the public money, then he shall cause such rooms to be prepared and fitted up, and such vaults and safes to be constructed in the custom-house at Charleston, and no independent office shall be there erected.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That for the payment of the expenses authorized by this act, other than those herein before provided for, a sufficient sum of money be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the protection of the western frontier; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of sundry owners of steamboats, against the passage of the bill regulating steamboats: laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War cause the Tangier sound and its tributaries to be surveyed.

On motion of Mr. RIVES,

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for refunding to those who have deposited money in the Treasury, for the purpose of purchasing public lands, and who failed to do so, the sums respectively deposited by them, upon their returning the certificate which was issued when the money was deposited.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of sundry merchants of New York, against abolishing, the office of surveyor of that port: referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, the memorial of the Brothertown Indians, resident at Green Bay, relative to their title to lands in the Wisconsin Territory, and praying that a law may be passed to permit them to become citizens of the United States: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NORVELL presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Marys, and in relation to publication of the laws and public documents.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 27, 1838.

Mr. PAYNTER, on leave, presented a memorial, signed by a number of citizens of Philadelphia, asking for an investigation into the late duel, which was referred to the select committee having that subject under consideration.

SUBSCRIPTION TO NILES'S REGISTER.

The business first in order was the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. PATTON, from the Committee on the Library, on Saturday last, and then postponed till to-day.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to subscribe for ten numbers of "Niles's Register" for each member of the House, to be delivered once a week: Provided, The editor of said Register will agree to publish in, or as a part of, said work, at least once a week, under the direction of the Clerk, the Journals of the House, with the yeas and nays on all questions: Provided, further, That the editor of said Register will also agree to publish, at the end of every session of Congress, under the direction of the said officer, a supplement to said work, containing all the laws passed thereat, and treaties ratified by the Senate: to which shall be prefixed a copious index, to be approved of by said officer, and furnish one copy thereof, free of charge, to each member of Congress for the time being.

Mr. PATTON entered into a detailed statement of the object proposed by this resolution, the effect of which was merely to circulate among the people the journals, votes, and laws of Congress, to the extent of six thousand copies, at a cost of only five thousand dollars, and this too in a permanent form, where they would be always accessible for reference. Mr. Niles did not ask for any augmentation of the subscription price to the Register, but looked for remuneration from an enlarged subscription list, in consequence of the work being hereby made more intrinsically valuable. The publication of the laws alone, in ephemeral papers, cost three times as much as was involved in this resolution.

Mr. PARKER of New York said he was opposed to the resolution; that he could never consent that the members of the House should be furnished weekly, at the public expense, with more than 2,400 copies of "Niles's Register," or any other newspaper. It would involve an expense at the rate of $12,100 per annum; and he denied that this could be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, under the language of the appropriation bill, as it was passed yesterday. That bill required that the contingent fund should be expended for the ordinary expenses of the House, and "for no other purposes." He intended to move to lay this resolution on the table. If that was not sustained, he should move to strike out "Niles's Register," in the second line, and insert "Democratic Review." If any periodical was to be so largely patronised by Congress, he should prefer the latter, though he could not vote for the resolution. Mr P. concluded by moving to lay it on the table.

Mr. GRIFFIN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 86, nays 79.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

At a subsequent stage,

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution for a subscription to Niles's Register was laid on the table, as, upon reflection, he thought he had given a wrong vote.

Mr. BOON moved to lay this motion on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 88, nays 84.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the case of Col. Joseph Brown; which was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the erection of custom-houses at New Orleans, Philadelphia, and Savannah; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a supplemental report to the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which, on motion of Mr. CASEY, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "an act to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, to appoint receivers general of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States," having been read twice by its title:

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PICKENS rose, and said that before this motion was acted upon, considering the importance of the subject, he desired to be informed on certain point, so that he might know how to shape his course upon the motion, and he should apologise to the House for trespassing in this way from the acknowledged importance of the subject, and the deep interest involved in it.

Mr. P. would not have desired information upon this subject, had it not been for an article which appeared in the official journal of this morning, which he had perused most painfully, and which had an ominous bearing. He desired to know, from the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether it was intended, directly or indirectly, to give this bill from the Senate the preference over the bill reported already through heir own committee, upon the same subject, to that House? He saw it intimated, that perhaps the provision [Mr. CALHOUN'S] which had been stricken out in the Senate's bill might be attached to some other appropriate bill, or introduced in an independent form, and in this article (from the Globe) he had seen not the slightest reference to the House bill upon this subject. Now Mr. P. considered this a question which, according to the theory of our Government, was peculiarly under the jurisdiction of this House; and, upon that consideration alone, he should be disposed to give their own bill the preference, as a precedent upon this subject. But he did not desire to trespass upon the House, and should not, but he most anxiously desired to know whether, in the future action of the Committee of Ways and Means, so far as the chairman was concerned, there was to be the slightest preference to the Senate's bill over that reported to the House from that committee?

Mr. P. concluded, by saying that he propounded this inquiry most respectfully, and it was due to the House to say that he had not the slightest conference with that gentleman. He asked it candidly and frankly. It was due to the House and to the country to know whether that emasculated bill, yes said he, a thing having the form of a man with the spirit of a eunuch, was to have directly, or indirectly, any preference given it over the one reported to this House on the same subject. If he was led to believe that it would not, and that our bill was was to be made the rallying point for the country, it would give him the greatest pleasure to vote with the gentleman, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] to give it the ordinary reference to his committee. There was a great question involved in the bill, and no temptation could make him falter in his course.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would answer the gentleman most cheerfully. For himself, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and he thought he could almost answer for every one of his colleagues on that committee, that he and they did infinitely prefer the bill reported to this House to the bill of the Senate. They had seriously and thoroughly examined all the provisions of the latter, and they had serious objections to many of its details; for some of its details besides those advocated by the gentleman from South Carolina, involving principles of very grave importance; and the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was, almost two-thirds of it, a new bill entirely. For one, he should not depart from one single section or feature of that bill, and should certainly feel it his duty, as a measure of this character should emanate from the House, to give the House bill the preference.

Mr. SERGEANT thought the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had made one remark from which Mr. S. dissented. The gentleman said that he thought he could answer for all his colleagues on the committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG begged to be understood as not, of course, intending to include those gentlemen opposed to both bills.

Mr. SERGEANT. He does not mean all the committee then, but thinks the majority are in favor of the House bill. Now, Mr. S. did not know which to prefer; that is, he did not know which was worse, and that was about the state of any opinion or judgment he then had. If the bill was what the gentleman from South Carolina had stated, an eunuch, why it was a sort of thing that, in some parts of the world, was entrusted with the care of a treasury, and if he could bring himself to believe that it was as innocent, by reason of its incompetence, as that class of persons were, he should have less objection to it; but he believed that it had vigor enough to do mischief, and that it was not safe to trust either one or the other bill; and for that very reason that those who were to be entrusted with the Treasury were perfectly competent persons to maltreat—to betray their trust—to be led by temptation to injure those who had entrusted them with the machinery. Both bills he believed to be exactly the same; the difference between them being that the one was to have the power of keeping bank notes, and the other that of keeping gold and silver, if it could get it.

All Mr. S. rose to say was, that, as one of the Committee of Ways and Means, he had no preference for either, but had strong objections to both, and was at a loss to know which was worst.

Mr. HAYNES said, that although not expressly called upon, he would, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, express his decided preference of the bill reported by that committee to the bill from the Senate. Desirous as he might be to answer the remarks of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SERGEANT,] he would not consume the time of the House by doing so.

Mr. PATTON was opposed to try this expedient in any form. He was opposed to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and did not think there was the least necessity in such a reference of the Senate bill as that now moved. This subject had been before that committee twice already, and they had given the House the fruit of their labors and meditations upon the subject. He considered it extremely important to the best interests of this country that this question should be decided, and decided promptly; and he should, when he sat down, make a motion which he hoped would bring to the test what was the judgment of the majority of that House, in regard to the principles of this measure. He was compelled, in order to accomplish his object of quieting, if the majority of the House should be opposed to this measure of quieting the apprehensions of the country, justly excited by the continued confidence with which it is alleged that this measure, fraught, as he sincerely and solemnly believed, with the most mischievous tendency to the best interests of the country, and with the greatest danger, in a political point of view, was to be determined speedily and promptly by a vote of that House. The object he had in view, and which, in his view of the question, was so important, could not be attained but by a vote which was not in the form of a direct rejection of this measure, but which was a decisive indication, and he hoped the vote would be so regarded, of the opinions of the House against any bill containing the principles of this measure, whether it be the bill from the Senate, or that reported from the Committee of Ways and Means. He did not urge, therefore, as a reason why this matter should not be referred, the fact that a majority of that committee had examined and were opposed to it, because he did not desire that the vote which he should ask the House to take, should depend upon any differences of opinion about the details or modifications, which did not touch the great principles of the measure.

Mr. P. said he was aware that there were several gentlemen anxious to present substitutes to one or the other bill—substitutes essentially changing the details, and, in fact, the principles of both measures; and, at the first blush, gentlemen might be disposed not to sustain the motion he was about to make; but there would be no difficulty whatever. Gentlemen who had such propositions to make might make them hereafter. There were a variety of propositions before the House upon which they might be discussed, and adopted too, if the House was disposed in their favor. All the questions involved in this measure might also be discussed at large, under some of these, and there was no good reason, therefore, as it seemed to him, for gentlemen who were opposed to the principles of this bill, being deterred from voting to lay it on the table, and thus furnishing an indication to the country that the majority of that House, if such be the fact, was opposed to the measure. And it would furnish too this additional advantage to them in presenting their propositions, viz: that as long as the friends of the Sub-Treasury, or Independent Treasury project, or what you please to call it, have the hope that they can carry their measure, they will, of course, oppose any and every substitute that can be offered for it, and any and every modification that will attack the principles of their measure. If, on the other hand, it be the opinion of the majority that the principles of this measure are not to be incorporated by their legislation, then gentlemen will find the proposed disposition of it necessary in taking the next best measure, if there be any next best, to accomplish the object they have in view, to attain the object of purifying and correcting our currency, by the next best project, or that which any gentleman might think best.

With these views, Mr. P. said he moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GLASCOCK hoped the gentleman, who had made a general speech, and gone somewhat out of the rules, in his opinion, would withdraw the motion to enable Mr. G. to make a few remarks in reply.

Mr. PATTON would very cheerfully yield, if he had discussed the principles of the bill, but he had not done so, and could not, therefore, withdraw the motion.

Mr. GLASCOCK. The gentleman had given reasons why the bill should be laid on the table, and Mr. G. appealed to his liberality to allow a reply so far. Mr. G. would renew the motion.

Mr. PATTON would then withdraw it.

Mr. GLASCOCK regretted exceedingly that this motion to lay on the table had been made at the present time; and he regretted the more to see the motion come from the quarter it did. The House was well apprised of the situation which the gentleman from Virginia occupied at the present time. It is well known that that gentleman had been provided for by his own State; and it is a question whether, whenever any action shall be had on this bill here, he will be representing the majority of his constituents, which an election, however, to fill his vacancy will test. But independent of these considerations, it is well known that at the present time one of the States of this Union is unrepresented. It is well known that there are certain districts in different States unrepresented; and it is equally well known that at this present time, there were a large number of the representatives of the people absent, from the indisposition of their families and other causes, absent and necessarily absent of this city, and from the House. If we are to have this question tested, and fairly tested, let us have it taken when every member is in his seat. Where is the necessity of the motion which had been made by the gentleman from Virginia at this time? Has it been made because the gentleman is himself about to take a farewell from us all, and is it from such motives as these, that he now asks us to take this question, when he well knows there are many individuals friendly to this bill not present to vote, and are particularly anxious to do so? If the gentleman had exercised that courtesy which is usual, on all great national questions, he would have delayed his motion until every member could be here in his place to represent his constituency. He asked the House, whether it was not best to act on whatever bill the Committee of Ways and Means may report, at a time when there may be a full and fair attendance of the representatives of the people present. He knew not what effect this might have on the minds of others, but he was prepared to say for himself, that this movement, at the present crisis, was far from being such a one as he had expected from the gentleman from Virginia, for on all other occasions he had looked upon that gnetleman as acting with candor and fairness. At this very moment there are some twenty or thirty members absent from their seats—in fact, it had been suggested by some gentlemen near him, that there were at least forty who were absent. No such proposition as this had been anticipated by those gentlemen, and it is a question on which it is expected by the whole country, that every member should be present to give his vote. He would ask the gentleman then, whether in order, that absent members might be present, and to have a full vote of the House on the question, he would not consent to withdraw his motion, and permit the bill to go to the Committee of Ways and Means, and be reported upon by that Committee, in order that some measure might be brought before the House, in order that the people of the country might see whether a majority of the House were not opposed to the principle contained in the bill: namely, the divorce of the Government and banks. He knew there were some who were in favor of the principle of this measure, but who differed as to details, and all he asked was, that the country might be properly informed, whether there was, or was not, a majority in favor of the principle which he had referred to.

On this subject, he must avail himself of the privilege he now had of showing the impression attempted to be made on the people of the "Old Dominion." A report had gone forth, stating that there were some fifteen or twenty of a majority in this House opposed to the divorce. Then, sir, if the gentleman from Virginia intends that the people of his State shall be fairly informed on this important subject, let the question be brought up fairly, and let us have such a vote as will truly test the principle. Do this, and he [Mr. G.] had nothing to fear; and so far as it was concerned, he hesitated not in giving it as his decided opinion that there was a majority in favor of a divorce of Government and banks, notwithstanding all that had been said in certain papers to the contrary.

Mr. MERCER rose to order. He wished to know whether the remarks of the gentleman were pertinent to the question under consideration.

The CHAIR was of opinion that the gentleman from Georgia, as well as the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PATTON,] had not confined themselves strictly to the question pending.

Mr. GLASCOCK, in conclusion, would only say he regretted that this motion has been made, as it was an evidence of unfairness which he little expected from the gentleman from Virginia. He should renew the motion, as he had pledged himself to do it, but he did it with the greatest reluctance, because whatever vote was now taken could not be considered a fair test of the question. He looked upon the motion as an act of illiberality towards the absent members, and as an act of injustice to the States and districts which were now unrepresented, and from causes well known to all.

Mr. G. then renewed the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. PATTON hoped the gentleman would withdraw this motion, so that his remarks might be answered.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he would not do this, unless the gentleman from Virginia and others agreed to have it withdrawn for a general discussion of the subject.

Mr. CUSHMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

The call was then proceeded in for some time, when

Mr. CUSHMAN moved that it be further dispensed with.

Mr. PATTON hoped not, after what the member from Georgia had insinuated. The insinuation made by that gentleman that Mr. P. made the motion to lay this bill on the table, more with reference to the absence of the friends of the measure than otherwise, was wholly unfounded. Mr. P. had not the slightest knowledge of the subject, nor had he ever taken the least pains to ascertain who were absent or who were present. He hoped, therefore, the House would suffer the call to go on, that it might then be seen who were absent and who present. So far as he was concerned, he would say that if there were any just grounds that any vote in this form, and at this time would do injustice, or be acting unfairly, he would unquestionably, at once, desire the motion to lay the bill on the table, withdrawn.

Mr. DUNCAN here raised the point of order, that the question was not debateable; for, if it was, he might be disposed to reply.

The CHAIR said debate was not in order.

Mr. PICKENS was in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire; but he rose mostly to protest against the construction given by the gentleman from Virginia that this would be a test vote. It would not be so.

The CHAIR here arrested further discussion.

Mr. GRENNELL then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the call; which were ordered, and were—yeas 92, nays 94.

So the call proceeded farther; and excuses having been rendered for several absentees, it was dispensed with, on motion of Mr. HARLAN.

The CHAIR then propounded the question to lay the bill on the table, when

Mr. LEGARE expressed a hope that the motion would be withdrawn.

The question was then taken, and the vote resulted in—yeas 106, nays 98, (38 members being absent, the House, with the Speaker, consisting of 242,) as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, William B. Calhoun, John Calhoon, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Hall, Halstead, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Henry J. NAYS—Messrs. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams, Worthington, and Yell—98.

So the Senate bill was laid on the table.

Mr. GRAY then rose and remarked that he had voted in the affirmative upon the question of laying the bill upon the table, for the purpose of availing himself of the right to move a reconsideration of the question—a right afforded under the rules of the House only to those who vote with the prevailing party. He gave notice that he should move for reconsideration to-morrow.

Several other bills from the Senate were then read twice, and appropriately referred.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Milligan was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DROOMGOOLE in the chair,) and took up and considered the bill directing the transfer of pension balances into the Treasury.

ARMY BILL.

The committee then took up the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1838."

Mr. EVERETT moved to strike from the clause "for subsistence, exclusive of that of officers, $1,040,797, including the sum of $390,885, for the subsistence of the volunteers and militia called out for preventing or suppressing Indian hostilities," the latter sum, and to reduce the former sum to $738,800.

After a few remarks by Messrs. BELL, CAMBRELENG, UNDERWOOD, EVERETT, McKAY, and MERCER,

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL wished to know, under the present circumstances of the county, whether the appropriations for the national armories might be dispensed with, as well as some other similar items.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that he had made inquiry of the proper departments, and the answer he had received from them, were of a character which would not authorize him as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means to strike it out. The Committee of the Whole, however, might do as it pleased, in relation to this matter, because he himself was of opinion that that some of those appropriations might be reduced somewhat.

After a few remarks by Messrs. MERCER and CAMBRELENG,

Mr. BELL moved to strike out the appropriation of $360,000 for national armories, and insert in lieu thereof $100,000.

McKAY hoped this motion would not prevail, because if the appropriation was not expended in the course of the year, it would not be lost. He did not consider that there was sufficient information in the possession of the House to justify this motion, and therefore trusted it would not prevail.

Mr. BELL said he had made this motion because of the present condition of the country. It seemed to him that it was entirely improper that the Government ought to be borrowing money to carry on such extensive operations as seemed to be contemplated by this appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, inquired of the chairman of the Military Committee what the amount of arms proposed to be manufactured in the course of the next year.

Mr. McKAY was unable to say, because he had not the information at hand. The Military Committee, however, intended to examine into the matter; and when they did so, they would report to the House. It was well known, however, that the country was very deficient in arms.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina was entirely opposed to making these appropriations as large, when the Treasury was bankrupt, as we had been in the habit of making heretofore.

Mr. HAYNES said he should hardly have risen at present, if it had not been for the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS] about a "bankrupt Treasury." We had heard the cry of "bankrupt Treasury" so often repeated, upon so many occasions, that he would take leave to remind that gentleman, the House, and the country, of its immediate and efficient cause, without adverting to others associated with it, by which the Treasury had been brought to its present condition. That cause was the deposite of twenty-eight millions of the public revenue with the States. If that sum had not been diverted from the purposes for which it was intended, we should not have heard of a "bankrupt Treasury."

As he was up, he would say a word upon the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] That gentleman proposes to reduce the appropriation of three hundred and sixty thousand dollars asked for, for the national armories, to one hundred thousand dollars, without giving us any data by which his mind has been governed, or which shall guide and direct the conclusion of ours. He was as ready as any member of this committee to go for every measure calculated to ensure as economical administration, and as strict accountability in the expenditure of the public money, as any member of the House. All that was necessary was to convince him, by fact and argument, that any appropriation asked for was extravagant, to induce him to vote for its reduction. But the gentleman from Tennessee, without any such showing, has asked us to cut down the appropriation for our armories from three hundred and sixty to one hundred thousand dollars.

So far as he was informed, the sum required for the present year did not exceed that which had usually been appropriated for the same purpose in former years. If gentlemen would look to the annual Treasury report of last December, they would discover that in three quarters of 1837, more than three hundred and thirty thousand dollars had been expended in this branch of the public service in three quarters of the year, leaving less than thirty thousand for the remaining quarter. If the appropriation of former years, when no extraordinary necessity existed, had averaged about the sum now asked for, surely the necessity was not lessened, when we had some eight or ten thousand men in the field, and the wear and tear of military munitions must be so much increased. The importance of the national armories to the defence of the country should make us pause before we consent to reduce the appropriation necessary to continue their operations, upon mere conjecture, and without any data whatever. If we scatter and disperse the skilful artificers who have been collected at those establishments, where shall we be able to find them in the time of emergency to which all nations are liable? It was worth while to remember that there were many laborers in those establishments, whose families were dependant upon their employment in them for their bread. He would not, he could not, on the single ground of humanity to persons thus situated, consent, without any evidence whatever, so to reduce the appropriation as to throw them upon the charity of the world.

Mr. HOWARD was opposed to the reduction of this appropriation, because if it was reduced it would compel the superintendents to discharge their workmen, and afterwards it would be very disadvantageous to commence the works again when they were out of order, and when, perhaps, good workmen could not be found.

Mr. HOLSEY must oppose this amendment, unless the gentleman from Tennessee could demonstrate that we had more arms than were necessary for all contingencies.

Mr. CALHOUN was opposed to the amendment, because, if it was agreed to, it would be impossible for either of them to carry on their operations. He hesitated not to say that these establishments were conducted with the greatest skill; and if this skill was dispersed through the country, it was almost impossible to collect it again. He looked upon the policy proposed here by the gentleman from Tennessee a most suicidal policy.

Mr. BELL then withdrew his amendment.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, the committee then rose and reported the bill to transfer the balances of the Pension fund, when this bill, having first been ordered to be engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

On motion

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, March 27, 1838.

Mr. KING presented the petition of Joshua Kennedy, asking confirmation to the grant of a certain tract of land in Alabama: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he presented, some time ago, a memorial from certain citizens of Hampshire county, Virginia, in relation to the exaction of specie at the post office, and complaining that while Stockton and Stokes were demanding it from the postmasters in payment, that one of the contractors was deluging the country with shinplasters. Mr. C. said that these people had heard that it was denied that such issues were made, and had, consequently, enclosed him one of the notes, with a request that it be referred to the same committee to which the petition was referred; and he made that motion in accordance with their request.

Mr. KING expressed his surprise that the Senator from Kentucky should move the reference of a shin-plaster to a committee. He might have handed it over without troubling the Senate with a formal presentment of such a trifling matter.

Mr. CLAY said he was sorry that he could not gratify the Senator; that the note had been sent as a voucher, and the letter containing it came in due course of mail, requesting that it should be so disposed of; and he would therefore ask that it be referred.

Mr. GRUNDY desired that the note might be read.

The Secretary having read the note, found it signed by "Lucius W. Stockton," for 25 cents, and payable for stage fare at Union, and other places.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the firm of Stockton and Stokes should not have been blamed for denying that they had issued what they really had not. This was quite another affair.

The "note" was referred to the Committee on Finance, the same to which the previous petition had been referred.

Mr. YOUNG presented a petition from sundry citizens of Boone county, Illinois, praying the establishment of a land office in that county: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WHITE: a communication from the Secretary of War, on the subject of Indian annuities: referred, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. RUGGLES: from Thomas A. Smalley and others, praying the construction of a light-house: referred.

By Mr. MOUTON: from an individual, asking a pre-emption right: referred.

By Mr. CRITTENDEN: from one of the heirs of Col. Armstrong: referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

By Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on District of Columbia, to extend the jurisdiction of Washington city over the Potomac bridge, and to authorize the sale of certain lots in that city: read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. ROANE, and after a conversation by Messrs. ROANE, KING, CLAY of Kentuck, HUBBARD, RIVES, and CRITTENDEN, a message was sent to the House asking the return of certain papers relating to a claim for interest on arrears of a pension to an individual (unheard) in Virginia, which claim had been rejected by the Senate. CUMBERLAND ROAD.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON, the Senate took up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

The subject of this bill was discussed by Messrs. NORVELL, TIPTON, STRANGE, CALHOUN,

SMITH of Indiana, MORRIS, BUCHANAN, SMITH of Connecticut, ROBINSON, WALKER, HUBBARD, CLAY of Kentucky, YOUNG, CLAY of Alabama, and KING.

The bill was opposed mainly on the ground of the existing embarrassments and bankruptcy of the Government; partly on that of the want of sufficient information, and partly on that of the inequality and injustice of the appropriation which it involved.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the bill was laid on the table; whereupon,

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Secretary of War was directed to inform the Senate what portions of the estimates for the construction of the Cumberland road, in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, might be dispensed with without injury to the road, and without violating existing contracts.

The Senate adjourned, after an Executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented four petitions on the subject of the late duel;

Mr. CUSHING also presented one on the same subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD presented the following petitions upon the subject of the late duel, which were referred to the select committee having that subject under consideration, viz: Beardsly Lape and 55 others, citizens of Canajoharie, New York; Stephen Barrows and 35 others, citizens of West Camden; Jacob Traften and 36 others, citizens of West Camden; Alexander Libby and 55 others, citizens of Hartford; Joseph Dearbon and 57 others, citizens of Hartford; Philip Abbott and 147 others, citizens of Rumford; Alvan Bolster and 145 others, citizens of Rumford, all in the State of Maine.

Among the resolutions adopted, was one praying the expulsion of all members of Congress engaged in, or in any view connected with, the said duel; which proceedings and resolutions were committed to the select committee having this matter in charge.

Mr. BEATTY of Pennsylvania also presented one on the same subject; which was referred to the select committee.

Reports from committees were then called for.

CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio reported a bill to establish a Board of Commissioners to examine and decide certain claims against the United States.

The bill having been read twice,

Mr. W. remarked that, as this bill proposed to establish a Board of Commissioners to adjudicate claims, and relieve the House and Congress of a mass of business, he hoped it would meet with its favorable consideration, and be taken up at an early day. If such a board was to be established, the sooner it was done the better. Mr. W. then moved that the bill be committed, and made the special order for Friday week; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana reported a bill to revive the supplementary act to the act to authorize the inhabitants of the State of Louisiana to enter a tract of land; which was read twice, and postponed till this day week.

Mr. HARLAN reported a bill for the relief of David Ballentyne.

Mr. H. also reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Abed P. Lacey.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

CHEROKEE AFFAIRS.

Mr. BELL moved that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of a memorial from Riverhead, in the State of New York, asking an inquiry into the validity of the Cherokee treaty, and that it lie on the table.

Mr. EVERETT asked for a division of the question on discharging and lying on the table, and made a few remarks on the subject, which were wholly inaudible, at the position occupied by the reporters of the Globe.

Mr. HAYNES said, desirous as he might be to repel the attacks made by the honorable member from Vermont, he would not follow the example he had sometimes seen set there, of making a speech, and then closing with a motion which deprived every one else of the opportunity of a reply. Mr. H. said, "I will abide my time." That time will come; and then, so far as he could, he would discuss the whole merits of the subject as well as he was able. He now demanded the previous question.

Mr. DAWSON requested his colleague to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HAYNES would willingly oblige his colleague, but he wished to stop this discussion.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question—ayes 70, noes 76.

Mr. DAWSON then addressed the House for some time, in arguing for an immediate disposition of the subject.

Mr. HAYNES said it was very much his desire that there should be no further discussion of this subject, or he would not have made the motion, which, as he thought, had unfortunately failed; or he would have, with great pleasure, withdrawn that motion, at the request of his colleague, [Mr. DAWSON.] He concurred entirely in the remarks which had been made by his colleague. It was too late to deal with this question as a mere abstraction. The time had gone by when any practical good could result, from an inquiry into the policy which had been pursued generally towards the Indians, and particularly towards the Cherokees. He would go one step further than his colleague had gone, with respect to the accountability which would rest some where if the country should be involved in war with the Cherokee Indians. He charged no one with stimulating the Cherokees to the course they had pursued and are now pursuing. But if there were any who had instigated and stimulated them to resist the execution of the treaty, upon his head would rest the blood of the white man and the Indian, of the delicate female and prattling infant, which would be shed by the tomahawk and scalping knife, if the Cherokees should be encouraged to persist in carrying their present course to extremities. Sir, what political purpose would be answered by the reference proposed by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT.] Has any one but that gentleman ever taken the ground that this House has any jurisdiction over the question of treaty or no treaty? Mr. H. believed, that in the whole course of his experience, here and elsewhere, he had never known that doctrine maintained by any one but the gentleman from Vermont. The utmost extent to which any one had gone, so far as he was informed, was, that if a treaty involved an appropriation, this House might or might not make it at its pleasure. For what purpose was it proposed to investigate the conduct of the late and present Administrations in reference to this subject? The gentleman from Vermont had intimated that the result of the investigation proposed by him might be the foundation of an impeachment against the late President of the United States. If that gentleman, or any other member of this House, believed the late President has exceeded his constitutional power in negotiating the Cherokee treaty, let him bring forward articles of impeachment against him.

If he should do so, he would find himself in a most singular position, in bringing that distinguished individual for trial before a body which was particeps criminis in the very act for which the gentleman from Vermont had intimated that it might be proper to impeach him.

He repeated that it was not his desire to enter into a general discussion of this subject. He had been taunted on other occasions by gentlemen who had brought up irrelevant topics with a desire to evade discussion. In this gentlemen were mistaken. He had no donbt a suitable occasion would shortly occur, when it would be his duty to discuss this subject; when, to the best of his ability, he would do justice to the State one of whose Representatives he had the honor to be.

Till then, he wished it to be put at rest by such a vote as would convince the Cherokees that they must abide by the provisions of the treaty. The sooner this should be done the better.

Mr. EVERETT briefly replied to the two gentlemen from Georgia, stating that it was not his opinion that these Indians would not have to remove from the State of Georgia. He believed it to be their true interest to remove, and he believed they would have to remove under some other treaty, if they did not under this. But he asked that justice might be done to them, and that such course might be pursued by the country as would prevent boodshed. He did not believe that any one had been holding out the idea to this Cherokee delegation, that there was a chance of their remaining in Georgia. Certainly he had heard of no one who had held out this idea to them, but he did hope to see justice done them by this Government.

Mr. CAMBRELENG here called for the orders of the day; but, at the request of several gentlemen, withdrew the call.

Mr. LAWLER believed that the course recommended to be pursued by the gentleman from Vermont, would be attended with no good results. He believed, so far as he had been informed on this subject, that John Ross had determined to enter into no negotiation, until this treaty was set aside. This being the case, he deemed it to be highly important that the House should take some action now; and the decision of this question, he thought, would be sufficient evidence to the Cherokees of the course which Congress intended pursuing. If the House determines that it will take no farther action on this memorial, the delegation will know what to expect; and he hoped the vote might now be taken, and the question put at rest.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina said that the dictates of humanity should prompt us to hold out no delusive hopes to these people. He trusted the House would now determine the question, and put this vexed matter at rest for the present. Mr. C. then called for the yeas and nays on the first part of the motion, viz: to discharge the committee, which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Wm. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Casey, Chambers, Clark, Cleveland, White, John White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise, and Yorke—75.

The motion to lay it upon the table was then agreed to without a division.

ARMY BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DROMGOOLE in the Chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1838."

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to strike out the item of $258,273 for arsenals, and insert the sum of $232,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. BELL thought this appropriation, considering the present state of the country, might be much more reduced. He then went into some statistics in relation to this appropriation, and concluded by moving to amend the amendment to $100,000.

Mr. YELL inquired whether this appropriation was intended to be applied to all the public arsenals, or whether it was only intended for a particular class of these establishments.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, that it was intended for the whole of them, there being sixteen of these establishments in the United States; and sent a document to the table, showing the appropriations which would be necessary for carrying on these arsenals for the next year, which was read by the clerk.

Mr. YELL should like, before a vote was taken, to look into the condition of some of these establishments. If the gentleman would so modify his motion, as not to make any reduction in those establishments which provided protection for the western frontier, he would not oppose it; but he could not consent, while the policy of the Government in removing the Indians upon their borders placed them in a perilous situation, to have the appropriations taken away from them which were to provide them a means of defence.

Mr. BELL thought the Secretary of War would exercise a proper discretion on this subject. He himself thought the arsenal in Arkansas ought to be kept up, but the appropriation for others might be dispensed with. He then modified his motion so as to make the appropriation $150,000.

Mr. YELL did not desire to have either the Secretary of War or the President to exercise a discretion on this subject. They were in need of the means of defence, and he trusted no discretion might be vested any where, which might deprive them of these means, by any considerations of policy or expediency.

Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted this as a modification of his motion, because he believed the estimates of the department had provided for many new works which he thought might be dispensed with for the present.

Mr. POPE disagreed from this opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He thought the estimates ought to be adhered to.

Mr. McKAY concurred with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject. He believed the appropriations for these new works might be dispensed with advantageously, considering the present embarrassed condition of the Treasury; and he hoped the motion to reduce this appropriation to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars might prevail.

Mr. MASON of Ohio apprehended the true and fair statement of the question to be one of postponement of some of the less needful objects; and, in the present condition of the Treasury, many of them might be postponed without its being interpreted as an indication of the sense of the House against their construction at some time or other. In reference to the appropriations, Mr. M. avowed himself disposed to vote as much as would keep the objects from suffering, though he was not inclined to go for new works.

Mr. YELL moved an amendment to the amendment, that $100,000 of the $150,000, or so much thereof as may suffice, to complete the arsenals already commenced, and those on the Western frontier. He moved this because he conceived the whole Western frontier should be put in a state of defence, and he wished the Executive required to carry the former laws on this subject into effect, which had not as yet been done, for the sites, as yet, in two years, had only been purchased and marked out.

Mr. MERCER expressed himself in favor of the amendment, and complained of the large expenditures for the construction of arsenals, $14,000 being contemplated, whereas less than half the money was sufficient; and yet still larger sums were called for, and forty acres of land purchased at Little Rock. All that was necessary was a single shed, strongly built, and protected from the weather, consisting of one or two rooms, with the occasional attendance of a man to look after the arms. He was opposed to any increase of the sums proposed in the law of 1830, viz: $14,000 for each.

Mr. McKAY referred to the estimates and statements of the Head of the Ordnance Department, showing that, in addition to the $14,000, owing to the high price of materials and labor, $10,000 more would be wanted to complete the arsenal at Liberty, Missouri, $12,000 at Little Rock, and $30,000 at Memphis, Tennessee, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee was intended to restrict the cost of those works to the limit of the law of '36, they could not be constructed. In reply to Mr. YELL, Mr. McK. said the delay complained of had arisen from the fact that the money appropriated was insufficient, and the Secretary of War could not go on to complete the works till Congress sanctioned a larger sum than originally proposed.

Mr. YELL complained that the whole of the first appropriation had been withheld till Congress had made an additional one. The Executive should have gone on to use what money there was, and not wait till a larger appropriation was made. He said, that if effective measures were not taken, and that speedily, to protect the Western frontier, in less than three years half the scalps of his constituents would be lying on the coals, from the General Government sending such large bodies of Indians there. If the Government would not protect Arkansas, give the people arms, and they would, and they were well able, protect themselves. The Creeks and the Seminoles had been sent there in chains, as they would never forget their degradation. The Cherokees were about to be sent there also, and his solemn conviction was, that, in less than two years, there would be a general war on that frontier.

Mr. McKAY had not justified the Executive in delaying the execution of the law with a view to get a larger appropriation. So far from it, he held that the Executive was bound to execute the law when it was practicable, but when only a third of the amount was sufficient, would it not be better to postpone making contracts, preparing materials, &c? because its size and extent could only be ascertained from the maximum of the sum to be expended.

Mr. YELL'S amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. MERCER moved a further amendment add the words, "according to the provisions of the existing law."

Mr. YELL inquired the object of this amendment.

Mr. MERCER replied that it was to meet the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, and to save a prodigal expenditure, or more than authorized by the existing law.

Mr. YELL. What, to limit the cost of the arsenal at Little Rock to $14,000?

Mr. MERCER. Certainly.

Mr. YELL. That will never do, for the work cannot be constructed for the money.

Mr. MERCER was convinced that $10,000 was sufficient to build an arsenal capable of containing a hundred thousand stand of arms; most probably for about half the money. The sum appropriated was abundantly sufficient, and he could not conset to sanction a violation of the existing law. He concurred with the gentleman in what he said about the necessary defence of the western frontier, rendered defenceless by the miserable policy of the Government in regard to the Indians.

Mr. YELL contended that $14,000 was insufficient, for a large supply of arms, and a magazine, were necessary at Little Rock, a point as important, at least, as that at St. Louis, which had cost $300,000. There must be quarters for two companies at least, officers, workmen, &c. and $14,000 would not begin to do it. If economy was intended, he would go with the gentleman, and knock off one-third, for his people would stand it, but then let them go through the whole bill, and cut down all other items in the same proportion. Make a general reduction of one-third, and he would be content to suffer with the rest; but the effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to cut down the three most important arsenals in the whole western country.

Mr. POPE believed the gentleman from Virginia was mistaken that an arsenal could be constructed at Little Rock for $10,000, though he regarded the cost of the ground, forty acres, at a hundred dollars an acre, as extravagant. He expressed his admiration at the spirit displayed by the gentleman from Arkansas in calling the Executive to account; but he did not apprehend the dangers spoken of, from the Indians on the Arkansas frontier, for the reason that the head-men of the Choctaws and Cherokees were men of large property, holding slaves, and cultivating the soil, whose interest it would be to repress their people. He was opposed to Mr. MERCER'S amendment, and thought it better for Mr. YELL not to have moved the one he did.

Mr. McKAY remarked that the proposed amendment was inconsistent with the one adopted, which embraced $100,000, or so much of that sum as might be necessary, to complete these arsenals; but if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia was adopted, no more could be expended than was appropriated in the act of '36. Where, then, was the use of Mr. YELL'S amendment? Mr. McK. stated further, that the gentleman from Arkansas was mistaken in supposing that it would be necessary to have two companies of troops at the arsenal.

Mr. MERCER denied there was any inconsistency in the two amendments. His amendment was intended to exclude the idea that $30,000 more should be expended for this work than was authorized by the existing law; but if it was excluded, it would be received as an indication that the House was willing to expend a larger sum. He believed the remaining balance of $10,000 was amply sufficient to construct the work; but, if not, let a separate bill be brought in for the purpose. Moreover, Mr. M. insisted that the appropriation itself was out of order, and could only be made by a special bill.

After some further remarks by Messrs. HOLSEY and JOHNSON of Louisiana against the amendment, it was disagreed to, and the original amendment was agreed to.

The other clauses of the bill were then agreed to.

Mr. BELL then moved an additional clause for drafts lying over and unprovided for, for arrearages on account of the Florida war, $553,415.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected to the amendment, because the item was embraced in another bill. Moreover, these heads of expenditure should be kept separate, and not an appropriation for the Florida war be included in the army bill.

Mr. EVERETT objected to the Seminole appropriation being divided.

Mr. BELL replied that the rule under which the gentleman from New York objected to this item, applied only to a whole bill, and not to a single, substantive proposition out of another bill. Nor was there any thing in the argument that these bills should be kept separate to ascertain the precise expenditure for the Florida war, because there are in this bill already from three to five hundred thousand dollars, though indirectly, viz: in increased clothing, subsistence, etc. Again, he was desirous of paying the arrearages at once, so that the discussion on the other bill might not be hurried, on the ground of existing claims or arrearages.

Mr. CAMBRELENG confessed that he was somewhat surprised at the anxiety manifested by the gentleman to pay the Governments protested drafts; but if he would make his amendment effective, he should propose to appropriate, at once, $2,000,000. Why, did not the gentleman know that the Florida campaign was now drawing to its close? And did he not know that the great mass of this expense was already incurred? Three months' pay was already due for the present year. Mr. C. was willing that a full debate should be had upon the Florida war, and it was for that very reason he desired to keep the bills separate; but if gentlemen continued to keep up long discussions upon small items, there would be no opportunity of reaching important measures.

Mr. DOWNING suggested an amendment, so as to cover the whole of the unpaid arrearages and just claims against the Government, on account of the Florida war, up to this time.

Mr. BELL. That was my intention.

Mr. DOWNING. Then $500,000 would not meet it, nor, he believed, two millions.

Mr. EVERETT persisted in his objection to this amendment, but preferred having two bills brought into the House; one to embrace the arrearages, and the other to provide for the future expenses of the war.

Without taking the question, on motion of Mr. MALLORY, the committee rose and reported, and then, on motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, March 28, 1838.

The CHAIR announced a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement of the amount of custom-house bonds, collected and paid annually from the 1st October, 1827, to 1st September, 1837: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass a law prohibiting any person from holding office under the Government, who has been engaged in a duel: laid on the table.

Mr. B. also presented a petition from a number of citizens of Philadelphia, asking Congress to establish a dry dock at the navy yard at that place: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS presented a petition from a number of citizens of Philadelphia, and one from sundry citizens of Starke county, Ohio, praying Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition from sundry citizens of Massachusetts on the same subject. The motions to receive the above petitions were severally laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS presented a petition from sundry citizens of Philadelphia, against the admission of any State into the Union, whose constitution tolerates slavery: laid on the table.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Cleveland, Cuyahoga county, Ohio, in relation to the late outrage committed on the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, by the invasion and burning of the steamboat Caroline at Schlosser. The memorial prays Congress to take such measures in relation to the outrage as the dignity, honor, and safety of the country required. Mr. A moved to refer the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no objection to the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but he wished first to say one word, lest some misapprehension on the subject should prevail in the country. We know, he said, that the subject of this outrage is in a course of negotiation between the British Government and ours. He hoped and believed that that Government would do us justice; but it would be obvious, that whilst the negotiation was pending, it would not be proper for the committee to make any report. If the time should come—and he trusted that it never would—when it would be necessary for the committee to act, there was no doubt but they would do their duty.

Mr. ALLEN said he had as much confidence in the patriotism of the committee as any one; and it was, therefore, that he desired the memorial to take the same course that had been given to one formerly presented by him on the same subject. He did not believe that the reference of the memorial would interfere with the negotiations going on between this and the offending Government; and he had barely, in obedience to the wishes of the citizens of one of the largest and most important cities of the West, situated in the vicinity of the territories of that Government which had committed the outrage, presented their views to the Senate. He had no doubt but the committee would exercise that wise and patriotic course which was consistent with them.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not at all suppose that there was any impropriety in this large and respectable meeting presenting a petition on a subject so interesting to them. His remarks were only intended as an apology for the committee, in not making a report on the subject.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of R. C. Hardesty.

Mr. ROBINSON, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of James Latham, deceased; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred three memorials from the citizens of Easton, Pennsylvania, and Richmond, Virginia, on the subject of a national foundry, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideratien thereof, the committee having reported a bill on the subject, leaving the selection of the site to the President. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, offered the following joint resolution:

RESOLUTION to authorize the purchase of an island in the river Delaware, called the Pea Patch.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to purchase of the lawful owner thereof, a certain island in the river Delaware, commonly called the Pea Patch, and that he report to Congress the contract which he may make, to be subject to their future action.

DELEGATE FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NORVELL rose and remarked, that he had, some weeks ago, introduced a resolution inquiring into the expediency of authorizing the people of the District of Columbia to elect a delegate to the House of Rrepresentatives. It was not his purpose to enter, at this time, upon the discussion of the subject, but to take up the resolution for reference. He had examined the Constitution, and all the other writings which he could lay his hands on, having a bearing upon the proposition. From these he could perceive no difficulty in carrying it into effect. A delegate, to represent the people of this District in Congress, would relieve the members of both Houses from much labor and examination, which they had very little leisure, from their own local and the national affairs, to bestow upon the peculiar interests of the District; and the measure would insure a more vigilant and just attention to those interests. He therefore moved to take up the resolution for consideration and reference.

Mr. ROANE inquired whether there was any petition or memorial on the subject from the people of the District, and, if not, in what manner the committee was to form an opinion as to their wishes. It did seem to him that it was time enough for Congress to act when requested to do so by those most immediately interested.

Mr. GRUNDY thought that the Senate ought not to move in this subject in any way, and that, as a matter of delicacy, the proposition should first come from the House of Representatives. The Senate, which had nothing to do with delegates, ought not to attempt to force a delegate on the other body, without consulting them.

Mr. NORVELL said, that if the people of the District had not petitioned Congress for a delegate, it was probably because they supposed that their petitions would receive very little attention. The subject had, on various occasions, been agitated among them; and he believed that they generally desired the adoption of the measure. If it were one proper and just in itself, as he thought it was, he could not perceive the necessity of waiting for the presentation of petitions from the people of the District, who, at present, enjoyed neither representation nor any other political rights. With regard to the only objection to the resolution, urged by the Senator from Tennessee, that the measure ought to originate in the other house, as the delegate was proposed for that house, he remarked, in justification of himself, that in a conversation with the chairman of the District, in the House of Representatives, he understood that honorable member to recommend action on the proposition here, in the first place, as it would probably pass through the Senate with greater facility, and then be acted upon with more promptitude in the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRUNDY still thought that the proposition ought to have come from the House of Representatives itself, and not in consequence of a suggestion from a member of it.

Mr. G. then moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON presented a memorial from sundry citizens of South Carolina, on the subject of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which lies one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to state to the Senate the number of fortifications complete, the number commenced, and unfinished, the number proposed to complete the system of defence, but not commenced, the size of each, the original estimated cost of the construction and armament of each, the amount which has been expended on each, and the amount necessary to complete each.

Resolved, That he be further instructed to state to the Senate, whether, in his judgment, if steam batteries should be employed in defence of our harbors, bays, &c. any of such fortifications can be dispensed with or diminished.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to communicate to the Senate, whether in his judgment, a system of defence by armed steamers, might not be organized, which would be more effective and economical than any made hitherto employed to resist invasion.

Resolved, That he be further instructed to lay before the Senate an estimate of the expense of organizing an efficient system of defence by armed steamers.

On motion of Mr. TIPTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Fredonia by Princetown, Indiana, to Mount Carmel, Illinois.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the corporate authorities of the town of Mobile; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate took up and considered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of William R. Taylor, administrator of Jonathan Taylor, deceased; and after a debate, in which the claim was advocated by Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, CRITTENDEN, GRUNDY, SMITH of Connecticut, YOUNG, WHITE, and STRANGE; and opposed by Messrs. HUBBARD, MORRIS, and PRENTISS.

The question was taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill, and decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, and Williams—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Walker, White, and Young—21.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama gave notice, that at one o'clock to-morrow, he should move to take up the bill to reduce and graduate the price of public lands, and he hoped the members from the nine States interested would be present, and prepared to give it their support.

The amendment of the House to the Senate bill for the relief of Michael Cassel was concurred in.

The following bills from the House were read twice and referred:

The bill for the relief of Samuel Milligan.

The bill directing the transfer of moneys remaining unpaid by certain pensioners, and authorizing the payment of the same at the Treasury of the United States.

On motion of Mr. PRENTISS, the Senate took up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to revive and continue in force the act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and ordered the same to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the bill for the relief of Sutton Stevens, which was laid on the table the other day, was taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, when Mr. C. presented some additional documents, obtained from the General Land Office, explanatory of the claim, and, after some remarks from Messrs. CLAY and LUMPKIN, the bill was again laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive busines;

After which, it adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, March 29, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Petitions on the subject of the late duel were, on leave, presented by Messrs. ADAMS, BIRDSALL, and DeGRAFF, and referred to the select committee, having that subject under investigation.

Mr. BIRDSALL, on leave, presented the proceedings of a public meeting of the citizens of Wayne county, New York, held the 16th day of March, 1838, of which Colonel Ira Jenkins was chairman, and S. Sailsbury esq. was secretary, called for the purpose of expressing their opinions upon the late sanguinary affair, at the seat of the General Government, which resulted in the death of the honorable JONATHAN CILLEY; which, on motion of Mr. B. were referred to the select committee, having the matter under consideration.

Mr. B. on leave, presented the memorial of John DeMott, and one hundred and fifty-five others, inhabitants of Seneca county, New York; also, the memorial of Lewis Johnson, and one hundred and twenty-nine others, inhabitants of the same county and State, praying Congress to expel every member of that body criminally engaged in the duel between the late Mr. CILLEY, and GRAVES, and that they be handed over to the legal tribunals of that State whose criminal code they have violated; which, on motion of Mr. B. were referred to the select committee, now investigating that subject.

Mr. B. also asked leave to present the petition of Thomas McClintock, and thirty-six others, inhabitants of Waterloo, New York, praying the House of Representatives to rescind the resolution of Mr. PATTON, of the 21st day of December, 1837, on the subject of abolition memorials; objection being made, the same was not received.

Mr. DeGRAFF presented a memorial from Eli Beecher and two hundred and ninety other inhabitants of Saratoga county, New York, in reference to the late duel; which was referred to the select committee on that subject.

MEXICAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. YELL presented a memorial from the Legislature of Arkansas, in relation to the boundary line between the United States and Mexico; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to authorize, for a limited time, two additional clerks in the office of the Commissary General of Subsistence.

WESTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri begged leave to inquire of the chairman of the Military Committee, when it was probable that committee would report a bill to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier?

Mr. McKAY replied that he had been instructed by the committee to prepare a bill on the subject, and it would either be reported to-morrow, or, at farthest, on an early day next week.

Mr. MILLIGAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported Senate bill, without amendment, for the relief of Irvine Shubrick.

BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.

Mr. INGHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill to extend and improve the navy yard at Broolyn, and to construct a dry dock at the same.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution proposing to make the "bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for French spoliations prior to 1801," the special order from and after 1 o'clock, on Friday and Saturday, the 13th and 14th days of April next.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped this bill would not be made the special order, and as it proposed an appropriation of five millions of dollars, he should feel compelled to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. C. however, withdrew the call, and the CHAIR was about to divide the House; when

Mr. HOWARD remarked that he wished to know the opinion of the House on this bill, and he therefore asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 79, nays 63.

So the resolution was not concurred in, requiring a majority of two-thirds.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Israel Parsons.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Neil Cannon.

Mr. TAYLOR, on leave, submitted a resolution directing the Committee on Invalid Pensions to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Samuel Hudson; which was agreed to.

POST OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department; which was read twice.

Mr. L. moved its commitment, and that it be made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. YELL and Mr. CAMBRELENG severally opposed giving this bill precedence over all other business, especially as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union it was always competent for a majority to take it up.

Mr. LINCOLN modified his motion by referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

ARKANSAS LANDS.

Mr. YELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to extend the further time of twelve months to the location of public donations in Arkansas.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported adversely on a memorial of certain citizens of Halifax, North Carolina, praying for additional compensation to the postmaster there.

REVOLUTIONARY NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a resolution instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of placing the officers of the United States Navy, engaged in the war of the Revolution, on the same footing, in respect to commutation, bounty lands, etc. as the officers of the army, engaged in the Revolutionary war; which was concurred in.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported Senate bill, without amendment, to authorize two citizens of Georgia to import, free of duty, the materials of two iron steamboats.

LANDS FOR SCHOOLS.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the consideration of the resolution of Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, to grant donations of lands to the old States for seminary purposes.

Mr. LAWLER, who was entitled to the floor, moved its reference to the same Committee on the Union to which a resolution submitted some time ago, on the subject of the public lands, by Mr. L. himself, had been referred; which was agreed to.

PRE-EMPTION SALES.

The vote of the House by which a resolution of Mr. SLADE, calling for certain information on the sales, &c. of the public lands, came up for reconsideration. The resolution required the specific amount of sales under the different pre-emption laws, from time to time, as they were made.

Mr. HOPKINS explained that he had made the motion on the 22d inst. at the desire of Mr. LYON of Alabama, who had stated to him that the scope of the resolution was such, that it would produce great delay in the general business of the land office if it was complied with.

Mr. LYON had no objection to the resolution, if it was so modified as to call for the information in the aggregate; but, if the specific information was insisted upon, it would take the clerks in that office two months to prepare it, to the hindrance of all, or nearly all, the other business.

Mr. SLADE could not consent to such a modification, for the information was indispensable in the form he had called for it, to ascertain the workings and operation of the pre-emption system.

Mr. LYON contended that the aggregate was all that would be necessary, but to go into each law, for the last fifteen years, would consume a vast deal of time, and a great deal of unnecessary labor.

Mr. SLADE would modify his resolution so as to call for the amount from year to year.

Mr. BOON went on to show that the gentleman could not attain his object even in that way, on account of some of the pre-emption rights extending to two years, and as the entries came on here by what was familiarly known as "duplicates," it was not probably known at the Land Office what were pre-emptions and what not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, hoped the resolution would be adopted, for it was necessary to have the information, in order, by showing the operation of the system, to endeavor, if possible, to check its spirit. He held, with the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] that the system was an evil, but whether it was or not, the information was indispensable.

The motion to reconsider was disagreed to, and on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House passed to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of Treasury notes issued under the authority of the act therefor passed at the last session of Congress, the amount of the same received in payment of the public dues, the amount of moneys received on account of customs and the public lands during the last quarter of the year, so far as the returns received show, and the amount of public money available for the public service now in the hands of receivers, collectors, &c.

On motion of Mr. BELL, laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DROMGOOLE in the Chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1838."

The question pending was an additional clause moved by Mr. BELL, for drafts lying over and unprovided for, for arrearages on account of the Florida war, $553,415.

Mr. BELL did not know that it was worth his while to insist strenuously on this amendment, after the opposition which had been made to it, but he thought it proper to make the motion on yester-

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

25TH CONG.....2ND SESS. MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1838. VOLUME 6.....No. 18.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

day, for the reasons he had then give. If, however, the committee saw proper to disagree to it, he had nothing farther to say.

Mr. DOWNING said he knew of $500,000, which were ready to be presented, but which had not been presented, merely because it was known the Treasury had not the money to pay them, until the appropriation was made. He trusted, if the gentleman expected his amendment to pass, that he would so modify it, as to provide a sum sufficient to pay all these claims. He hoped no amendment would be made which would not meet the claims, and which would give the department a discretion to make discriminations, which must, at all times be odious.

The amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved an amendment for contingencies of the army $5,000; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. moved further to amend the bill, by adding a clause for the settlement of the claim of the heirs of William Melldrom, $268; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. moved a further item, paying Adam Eckfelt for preparing gold medals for certain officers of the army and navy,

After a few remarks by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, SERGEANT, and RICE GARLAND, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEGARE saw that the appropriation for arming fortifications had been reduced from two to one hundred thousand dollars. He begged leave to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on what grounds these reductions had been made by the committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that heretofore the appropriation for arming fortifications had been $100,000, but, in consequence of the state of the country, and of the Treasury, at the last session, it was deemed proper to increase this appropriation to $200,000. The committee, however, considering the present embarrassed state of the Treasury, and knowing that there was a large balance of the old appropriation, they had considered it expedient and proper that this reduction in the appropriation ought to be made. Furthermore, he did not believe that more could be expended advantageously to this purpose.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

NAVY BILL.

The committee then took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the navy for the year 1838.

The bill being read through,

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated, for the information of the House, that the appropriation proposed to be made by this bill, was much less than that made at the last session of Congress, and went into several statements, showing in what particular items the appropriations had been reduced.

Mr. McKAY then inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether the first appropriation in the bill provided for any new navy officers? He thought there were now too many midshipmen in our navy, their number now being about four hundred and fifty; and he believed three hundred to be ample for all the exigencies of the service. There was no limitation upon the Secretary as to the number to be appointed, and the only control the House had over the subject, was by the appropriation for the purpose. He trusted, therefore, that this clause provided for no new officers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the appropriation for this purpose was made in pursuance of the estimates of the department of November last, which were in the ordinary form. These estimates were not so large as they were the previous year, which was in consequence of the surplus arising from the unexpended balances of appropriation. It might be possible that it would enable the Secretary to apply a portion of it to the payment of new officers, but if so it must be to a very limited extent, because the appropriation was less than it was the preceding year.

Mr. CAMBRELENG offered to amend the bill, by adding a clause for fixtures and other expenses of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, $1,200; which was agreed to.

There being no further amendment proposed, the bill was laid aside.

RED RIVER RAFT.

On motion of Mr. POPE, the committee then took up the bill from the Senate, making an appropriation of $70,000 for the removal of the Red river raft.

There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

On motion of Mr. MASON of Ohio, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. M. moved an amendment providing a change in the mode of superintendence of the road, but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. McKENNAN, in pursuance of the instruction of the Committee of Roads and Canals, moved an amendment to provide for the erection of guard fences on the road east of the Ohio, and for widening the same at Laurel Hill, and for the payment of the expense incurred in the erection of tollhouses on said road.

After a few remarks by Messrs. POPE, McKENNAN, MERCER, and McCOY, the question was taken, and the amendment agreed to—ayes 72, noes 50.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved that the committee rise, and report these four bills to the House.

Mr. MALLORY expressed a wish to have the naval bill so amended as to have some information about the exploring expedition.

Mr. MONTGOMERY should oppose the bill on the ground that it did embrace this appropriation, for though as warm a friend to the navy as any man in the country, he was opposed to this whole scheme, and in the House he should move to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, for the purpose of making this appropriation specific.

Mr. CAMBRELENG should be as glad as the gentlemen, if they could call back into the Treasury the many hundred thousand dollars already expended for this prolific exploring expedition; but, as they could not so act retrospectively, it would be better now to go on with it; and as they had the officers to support, it would be better to send them to the south pole for discipline than to the Mediterranean. Mr. C. was not an advocate for the expedition originally; but thought, on a more moderate scale, it had better now proceed.

Mr. INGHAM referred the gentleman from Virginia to some documents from the Navy Department on this subject, which contained all the information that was probably required, and asked gentlemen to suspend their judgment till they had read those communications.

After some further remarks from Messrs. MALLORY and REED, the Committee rose and reported the above four bills to the House.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the army, for the year 1838, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, with two exceptions; which will be noticed, were concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment, making a reduction for national armories, from $360,000 to $340,000, and it was non-concurred.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, reducing the appropriation for arsenals, was concurred in.

Mr. BELL moved to reduce the appropriation for national armories from $360,000 to 260,000, and urged it upon the House, because of the present condition of the country and the National Treasury. It seemed to him the true policy would be to merely make an appropriation for keeping the building and machinery in order, which would enable us at any time to put them into active operation. We had already expended about seven millions of dollars in carrying on these armories, besides the four millions which had been paid to private establishments for arms for the States.

Mr. MASON of Virginia opposed the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to reduce this appropriation, and contended that the true policy of the Government was to keep up these establishments, and make such appropriations for their support as would enable the Government to discontinue the practice of making purchases of small arms from private establishments.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts hoped there would be no reduction in this appropriation, because, if it was reduced, it would tend to the destruction of one of the most beautiful systems of manufacturing which was carried on in this country. We already once attempted the reduction of the appropriations for these establishments, and had seen the evil tendency of it, and he hoped the House would not again adopt this ruinous policy. He considered it a most mistaken policy to stop the operations of these establishments, after the most eminent skill had been found to exist in them, and he trusted the Government would not pursue any such course, because if the skill which was there concentrated was scattered abroad, it would be with great difficulty that it could again be brought to bear, when perhaps it might be most needed.

After a few remarks by Mr. BELL, the amendment was disagreed to.

The bill was then, after having been ordered to be engrossed, read a third time and passed.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the support of the navy, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The CHAIR then announced the question to be on the engrossment of the bill.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. MONTGOMERY hoped the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would not press the question on the engrossment of the bill at the present time, as there were some items in it, in relation to which he [Mr. M.] felt considerable doubts. He was desirous of voting for the bill, and for all appropriations which might be necessary to carry on the ordinary operations of the navy; but he trusted that this House, after the decision it had made a few days since, would not pass an aggregate appropriation of the people's money of a very large amount, which was to be expended in sending an expedition to Symmes's cylindrical world. He was opposed to making an appropriation for the Exploring Expedition before we had the necessary information from the department on the subject, which would be laid upon our tables in a few days, and he trusted the gentleman would permit this bill to lie over without having any further action taken upon it, until the information to which he referred was received.

Mr. WISE thought the gentleman's objection to this bill, on account of this appropriation for the South Sea Expedition was not well founded. Under all the circumstances, he thought this appropriation ought to be made, although he was not in favor of sending out this expedition into any distant seas. Mr. W. then gave notice to the gentleman from North Carolina and to the House, that on Monday next, when resolutions would be in order, that he intended moving a resolution for the purpose of converting this Exploring Expedition into a coast squadron, for surveying our own coasts, and protecting our vessels upon them. It has been demonstrated during the last year that such a squadron was essentially necessary, for although it turned out that no piracy took place on the Capes of the Delaware, yet it was for some time seriously apprehended that one of your Philadelphia and Liverpool packets had been captured almost within sight of one of your greatest commercial seaports. This showed that such a capture might have taken place, and was a sufficient evidence that this squadron was necessary for our defence, as well as for the protection of our vessels in time of storms, and for ascertaining all the shoals and breakers, and dangerous places, which might now not be known. Our own coast has never been properly surveyed and examined. It is a fact well known, that the British Admiralty now know more about the waters of the Chesapeake bay than the officers of our own navy do. Then, if the House concurred with him in this conversion which he proposed, the expenditure made by this bill will not be wasted; and he felt confident that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would agree with him that this squadron would afford a better school for our navy officers than the Exploring Expedition, because they could be changed at short intervals, and many more could be brought into it, than could be into the other expedition.

He was opposed to this expedition for many reasons, but mainly becanse, by the present organization of the Navy Department, to say nothing of the incompetence of the head of it, there was no hope of carrying out any great measure whatever. The responsibility of that Department was divided between the Secretary and the Navy Commissioners; and where this was the case, nothing could be done as it ought to be done.

Mr. REED did not concur with the gentleman from Virginia in his effort which he was about to make to destroy the Exploring Expedition. He agreed there was great necessity for a coast squadron, but he believed we had plenty of vessels and officers to have that and the Exploring Expedition also; and he looked upon it as being as important to commerce that we should have surveys made in distant seas as upon our own coast, because our vessels traversed every sea, and went upon every coast.

Mr. MONTGOMERY did not concur with the gentleman from Virginia in casting censure upon the Head of the Navy Department. He did not stand there the advocate of any man, but it was far from him to cast censure on any one. He was in favor of a squadron being placed upon our own coast, for the purpose of making surveys, whether they were north or south, and had always voted for these objects; but he was opposed to this scheme of sending a part of our navy into the South Seas for the purpose of making surveys and explorations, while our own coasts were but little known by many of the officers of our navy.

He apprehended that the Secretary of the Navy would be found to be more free from blame, when all the facts were known in relation to this matter, than the gentleman from Virginia was aware of, and hoped no censure might be cast upon that officer until the circumstances in relation to this expedition were all brought to the notice of the House.

Mr. M. concluded by moving to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to strike out the item for the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. MERCER was opposed to the scheme which the gentleman from Virginia proposed, to break up this Exploring Expedition, and hoped it would not be agreed to, when brought before the House. He expected much from this expedition; was opposed to having it broken up in this way, when it was nearly ready to sail, and considered it to be the duty of this country, it being the second commercial country in the world, to add its quota to the cause of science, which he thought would be done by this means. He looked upon it as being quite as necessary to have a knowledge of distant seas as of our own waters, and agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we might have a squadron on our coast, without interfering with this other object.

Mr. WISE considered that we ought to put our navy on a respectable footing at home, before we went abroad on an expedition of this kind. He thought we ought first to make the officers of our navy acquainted with our own coast; and he believed it to be a fact, that there was not a single lieutenant in it who could pilot a man-of-war into one of our own ports. He considered it would be necessary to make this appropriation in any event, because it provided money to pay these officers, and they would have to be paid whether they went abroad or not. He hoped, however, with that view, that this bill might lie over until we had some action on the proposition he had referred to.

On motion of Mr. WISE,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, March 29, 1838.

Mr. ALLEN presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Ohio, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Chillicothe, by Frankford and Bloomingsburg, to Springfield: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. NORVELL presented the petition of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for the establishment of a mail route: referred to the same committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of sundry citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, on the subject of duelling, and similar to the memorials lately presented by him on that subject from the same county: laid on the table.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a law to authorize the President of the United States to issue a patent to the heirs and legal representatives of Francis Rivard, for an island in the Mississippi river, opposite the town of Ste. Genevieve, State of Missouri, which said island was granted by the French Government to Rivard in the year 1756, and pronounced by the board of commissioners a complete title in the year 1812.

Mr. WEBSTER presented two petitions from citizens of Massachusetts, against the Independent Treasury, and two petitions from citizens of Philadelphia, against the admission of Texas into the Union: all of which were laid on the table.

Mr. FULTON presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Arkansas, instructing their Senators, and requesting their representatives in Congress to use their endeavors to obtain the passage of a law providing for running the boundary line between that State and the new Republic of Texas: referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. Lyon, leave was given to the heirs of Henry Mudd to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. KING, the bill giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty with Spain was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the petition presented by him some days ago in relation to the international copy right bill, was referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the bill making an appropriation for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin was taken up, and after a debate in which it was supported by Messrs. LYON, NORVELL, KING, LINN, TIPTON, YOUNG, and WHITE, and opposed by Mr. WALKER, the bill, after an amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to take up the bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped the Senator from Alabama would not press the taking up of this bill to-day. He, for one, was not prepared to go into a consideration of this measure, and he hoped it would be passed over or made the order of the day for some day next week.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied that he did not expect to take any vote on any one question involved in this bill to-day, and he did not believe that the Senate would be unwilling to indulge the Senator with an opportunity of giving his views on it. He was unwilling, however, to accede to the proposition to postpone the bill, as he could not see how the personal convenience of the Senator would be promoted by it.

The bill was then taken up, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama explained the merits and objects of the bill at some length, and removing the objections that might be urged against it; after which,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky again urged the postponement of the bill, and the making it the order of the day for Monday next. He looked upon this as one of the most important measures that could be brought before Congress, affecting the public domain to the amount of millions.

After some remarks from Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, NILES, and GRUNDY,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that if no gentleman wished now to address the Senate on the subject, he and the other friends of the bill were willing to lay it on the table till Monday, provided the Senator from Kentucky would agree to move to take it up on that day.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky assented, and on his motion the bill was laid on the table, with the understanding that it be taken up on Monday next.

[The speech of Mr. CLAY of Alabama will be given in full as soon as it can be prepared.]

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the bill for the prevention and punishment of duelling in the District of Columbia was taken up, the question being on the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORVELL said, that by the third section of the amended bill before the Senate, any person leaving this District with a view to challenge, or accept a challenge, to fight a duel without the District, was subject to indictment and punishment to the extent of twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. Now, he suggested a doubt whether Congress had any power to extend its jurisdiction, in cases of this kind, into the several States of this Union. It was competent for Congress to exercise this power within the limits of the District. Here their jurisdiction in these cases was completed. He was, therefore, of the opinion that the third section of the bill was unconstitutional. It was the more exceptionable, as it proposed to punish the mere conception of an intention within the District to engage in a duel beyond its limits. He was in favor of the object which the bill had in view, that of effectually suppressing the odious practice of duelling, but he desired to accomplish that object in a proper and constitutional manner.

After a debate, in which Messrs. SMITH of Connecticut, SMITH of Indiana, CLAYTON, MORRIS, ROANE, GRUNDY, and STRANGE, took part,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, and without taking any question on the bill,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 30, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. FAIRFIELD presented the following petitions upon the subject of the late duel, which were referred to the select committee having that subject under consideration, viz: R. Lang and 72 others, citizens of Surry; John Somes and 35 others, citizens of Mount Desert; Hiram Burr and 30 others, citizens of Brewer; Jefferson Chamberlain and 54 others, citizens of Eddington; R. Long and 23 others, citizens of Surry; George Lennard and 14 others, citizens, of Thomaston, all in the State of Maine, and Thomas Graham and 73 others, citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia.

Mr. TAYLOR presented three several petitions from the inhabitants of the towns of Manlius, Cicero, and Marcellus, Onondaga county, New York, relative to the late duel, which resulted in the death of the Hon. JONATHAN CILLEY, asking Congress, "out of a regard to the freedom of debate, the character of Congress, the example to the country; out of a decent respect to the opinions of the world, and to the laws of God and the Republic, to expel every member criminally engaged in that transaction."

Petitions on the same subject were presented by Mr. GRENNELL of Massachusetts, Mr. HAMMOND of Pennsylvania, and Mr. TAYLOR of New York, which were similarly referred.

Petitions on private matters were, on leave, presented by Messrs. SOUTHGATE of Kentucky, and McCLURE and LYON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARPER, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio, in relation to a Western armory; which were referred to the same Committee of the Whole having that subject under consideration.

Mr. SERGEANT, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, on the subject of a dry dock.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resoved, That the Committee of Ways and Means inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of the officers of the Mint at Charleston and New Orleans.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. then reported an amended bill, making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for arrearages for the year 1837; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. C. also reported Senate bill, without amendment, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to correct a mistake in the payment of a sum of money awarded to Fortescue Whipple, surviving partner of Conway and Fortescue Whipple.

The bill having been read twice,

Mr. C. moved the House go into committee thereon, explaining the urgency of the claim, arising out of a mistake in paying money into the Treasury.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana objected to giving any one claim preference over all others.

Mr. MALLORY and Mr. POPE said a few words in favor of the motion; which was agreed to.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SNYDER in the chair, considered the bill, rose and reported it to the House, and it was read a third time and passed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported Senate bill, with sundry amendments, entitled, an act for the relief of certain persons therein named.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made a favorable report on the case of D. C. Johnson; which was referred to the same Committee of the Whole having charge of a bill for his relief.

FORT GIBSON.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, with an amendment, a joint resolution from the Senate, directing the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the troops from Fort Gibson.

The amendment proposed to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase a site for a fort at or near the Western boundary of Arkansas, and Mr. McK. moved it be concurred in.

Mr. MERCER inquired of the gentleman from Arkansas whether the proposed arrangement in this amendment was in conformity with the plan for the defence of the western frontier.

Mr. YELL replied that it was.

The resolution was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. RIVES, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James H. Grant, —— Simpson, and —— Vorhees.

Mr. EWING, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Thomas Maxwell.

Also, a bill for the relief of the executors of Robert McFarland, deceased, late a pensioner of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, moved that the unfavorable report heretofore made by him from that committee on the petition of John W. Cox, be taken from the table, and referred to a committee of the Whole House; which was agreed to.

POSTAGES.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. LOOMIS of New York some time since, came up in order, and was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General furnish to this House an estimate, showing, as near as he can ascertain,

1. What proportion of the mails of the United States consists of free parcels estimated by weight.

2. What proportion consists of free parcels estimated by amount of postage on parcels that pay postage, and accounting all printed documents at pamphlet postage.

3. What would be the proportion of the amount of postage to be paid by the Government, in case all free parcels were charged to Government at the same rate that printed parcels are charged.

4. To how low a rate the tariff of postage can be reduced, and sustain the Department, in case all parcels conveyed in the mails were chargeable with postage.

5. To how low a rate the tariff of postage can be reduced, now or prospectively, within two years, retaining the present franking privilege, and sustain the Department, with a rate of tariff deemed judicious and proper by him, in case such reduction should be ordered.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The following, submitted some weeks since by Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, also came up it in its order:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof, as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed, also, to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the Government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. HOPKINS said he had no disposition to debate this resolution, but would feel willing the House should at once vote upon it. A few remarks as to the reasons which had induced him to offer it, might not be out of place. He was satisfied that such a proposition was peculiarly called for, and should be adopted. It aimed at what he regarded as a growing evil. The extraordinary increase of the expenditures on the part of that House for its printing was a subject, he thought, forcibly calling for some reform. The resolution, however, related as well to the printing done for the several Executive departments, as for that done under the order of the House, the increase of the expenses of which had been enormous. During the year 1829, the whole expense of the Congressional printing only amounted to about $30,000, it was now about $100,000, He could not say what that of the Executive departments amounted to, but the evil was augmenting there also.

The object Mr. H. had in view, not only proproposed to effect an actual saving of some sixty or seventy thousand dollars a year, but another no less important object, that of separating the patronage of the Government from the public press of the country. In proposing this, he had himself no party or personal views to subserve, and the person who now did the printing for the House, had but a small party in his support there, and Mr. H. was one who voted for him. It was not to favor any particular party, or the editor of any political journal, that this proposition had been introduced, but, on the contrary, to separate, as far as possible, the Government patronage from the public press.

Nor did Mr. H. confine his object alone to the political journals published in the city of Washington. By the present arrangement of publishing the laws of the United States, there were some eighty or more newspapers throughout the Union enjoying, in this way, the peculiar patronage of the Government; and he was for taking that away also, and devising, if practicable, some scheme by which the same object could be accomplished, and which he believed might and could be devised. It could be done by a general publication in this city, in the Congressional printing office, and the dissemination of a large number of copies throughout the country. Either this or some other mode might be devised.

If the independence of the public press was important, it was no less important for the attainment of that object, to separate it from this corrupting influence, for corrupting it is, and corrupting it will continue to be whilst human nature continues what it is. He repeated that he had no desire to debate this proposition, for it was not the discussion, but the action of the House he wanted, and he had no doubt that gentlemen had sufficiently weighed and examined it to vote upon it.

The resolution proposed to raise a committee to inquire into the expediency of separating the patronage of Government from the public press. If this was desirable, and it seemed to him no one could question it, it was certainly proper and necessary to inquire whether any, and what, substitute could be devised; whether it be an evil, and if an evil, how could a corrective or remedy be applied, and what that remedy could be. He thought it could be found in the establishment of a public press, entirely separated from Government patronage, confined only to the printing of the Government, as well that of both branches of Congress as that of the Executive departments. Even as a question of economy, if they could effect a saving in one single year that would cover the entire cost of such an establishment, it was highly important, and he thought this would be the case. Why, since 1829 the annual expense of the printing of Congress had swelled from $30,000 to $100,000 a year, and, including the Executive Departments, to probably nearly $150,000; and that, too, while it was well known that the present rate of prices allowed to the public printer had remained unchanged. The Government loses the benefit of all the improvements and benefits which had grown out of the substitution of machinery in presswork for manual labor power, and all the advantages of the general reduction in the price of paper, no unimportant item.

At any rate, continued Mr. H. this resolution proposed no interference with any party. It proposed only an investigation into the expenditure of money for public printing, a subject certainly, as it seemed to him, worthy of investigation. That investigation could be made without prejudice to any party; and as it proposed a retrenchment, there could be no reasonable objection to it, especially at this crisis, when they had, only a few months ago, saddled the country with a debt of ten millions of dollars, and had a proposition before them of saddling it with ten millions more. Under the present mode, they were going on with a most profligate and uncalled for system of expenditure, whilst the Treasury was substantially bankrupt.

With reference to the necessity that might be alleged for the publication of the laws in a newspaper, it was not so indispensable, for the fact was known to Mr. H. that the selection of the papers was not always confined to that press having the largest circulation in its neighborhood, or the State wherein it was published. But whether that portion of the Government patronage had been properly or improperly dispensed, was not germane to the proposed inquiry under this resolution, for his object was, sincerely and heartily, to sever this influence, and he much doubted, if there was a single inquiry that would come before the House this session, more entitled to its grave and serious consideration.

In conclusion, Mr. H. disclaimed having any private feeling in this matter, and he knew not whether he should again have any agency in dispensing the patronage of the House. His sincere desire was to separate it on public grounds alone. In point of economy alone, it was a proposition peculiarly and forcibly recommending itself to the favorable consideration of that House. As a political question, aside from party—for, as he said before, party feeling had, or should have, no connection with it—the measure ought to meet the approbation of al.. He hoped the House would at once vote upon it, and adopt it.

Mr. CUSHMAN was understood to say that he most cordially responded to the gentleman's desire to introduce reform and retrenchment. But, said Mr. C. it should commence in that House itself. During the last Congress, and during the late and present sessions of this, much had been said in regard to Executive abuses, Executive usurpation, and Executive corruption; and during the whole series of these repeated declamations, he, for one, had been of the opinion that the abuses in that House, in the same period of time, had been more and greater than in the Executive branch of the Government during the whole course of the late and present Administrations.

Nevertheless, Mr. C. was opposed to this resolution. He was opposed to it, because he was convinced the object sought to be attained by it was wholly impracticable. The gentleman says "let them inquire." That was all very proper, and Mr. C. was willing to go as far as that gentleman, or any other, to make necessary inquiries. But what was the present case? Now, it was well known that, since the establishment of the Government, the dominant party, whichever it might be, not only in the Federal, but in the State Legislatures also, had invariably employed what has been called, if you please, partisan printers and partisan editors. And why should they not do so? So long as the Opposition had the predominancy, they used to employ their own partisan printers, and no complaint was made about it; and why should any complaint arise now? He saw no reason for it.

It was said, however, that the expenses of the public printing by the House had very much increased during the last few years. He admitted it; but the fault was in the House itself, and there was as much power in the House to correct it without raising a select committee for the purpose as by one, and it was just as easy. The increased expenses had grown out of the increased number of documents ordered to be printed, and the evil could be corrected by gentlemen rising in their seats and objecting to it. There was, therefore, no necessity to raise a special committee for this purpose.

Again, the gentleman says that if this evil were corrected, or, in other words, that if a person could be selected, other than a partisan printer, it would, at once, reduce the expenses of the public printing. Now, Mr. C. apprehended directly the reverse would be the result, because if you ever bring into this city a person, and set up a press here under his management, for the express purpose of doing the printing of the House, the expense will be doubled, instead of being reduced. He was convinced, after much reflection, that this would be the result.

Again, says the gentleman, the Government patronage of the public press to partisan editors, not only here, but throughout the United States, ought to be taken away. Now, Mr. C. would appeal to the gentleman, and ask him into what State he would go and find a printer who was not a partisan? None: Mr. C. knew of none. Let the gentleman go into New Hampshire, and if he could find a printer there who was not a partisan, on one side or the other, he could do more than Mr. C. could, for he was wholly ignorant of any such editor. There was no such thing there. Call an individual into this city, let him set up a press or set up one for him, to do the printing of Congress, and how long would he remain here without being a partisan printer? It was not in the nature of things. It was not in human nature to be indifferent and listless upon the great and vital subjects that agitate the public mind. The feelings and impulses were the same in an editor as in every body else, and I, said Mr. C. have often made the remark, and will again attest its truth, that whenever an individual says he is not a party man, or that he is no partisan in politics, then I have a right to doubt that man's integrity, and I do doubt it. Sir, I had much rather see a man a partisan than one who is not, because then I know and believe that he is an honest man—whether he is my friend in politics or my foe, makes no difference. Let him be a partisan. It shows he takes a deep interest in the great questions that agitate the country. It is so in regard to all public editors, and should the gentleman's resolution be adopted, should this special committee be raised, and should they report a resolution declaring that the Secretary of State shall employ no editor to publish the laws of the United States who is a partisan, then, sir, your laws will go without being published at all. Editors and publishers are all partisans; either with the Administration, or opposed to it.

At this stage Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio called for the orders of the day, being private bills.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Mr. CLARK begged leave to propound an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. It was, when he proposed moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, the very moment they got through the pressing and urgent appropriation bills, he should ask the consent of the House to take up that subject.

THE FULTON CLAIM.

The House then took up the motion, made on a former day by Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, to reconsider the vote by which the "bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton" was passed.

Mr. DUNCAN, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length in support of the motion to reconsider, and in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied at length, and defended the claim of the heirs of Mr. Fulton with great earnestness.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON went into an explanation of the reason which had induced him to make the motion to reconsider, and why he should vote against the bill.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio replied at some length to the gentlemen from South Carolina and Ohio, explained the reasons which had induced the committee to report the bill, and stated why he thought it ought to pass.

Mr. CUSHMAN rose, and moved the previous question, but withdrew the motion, at the request of Mr. BIDDLE, who replied to the remarks of Mr. DUNCAN, at some length, and supported the claim with great zeal. Mr. B. then, in accordance with the pledge given the gentleman from New Hampshire, renewed the motion for the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MITCHELL called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which was on the motion to reconsider; which were ordered, and were—yeas 81, nays 87.

So the motion to reconsider was decided in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of all letters written by the Secretary of the Treasury to collectors or receivers, between the 1st of January, 1834, and the present time, having any reference to defalcations, omissions, or any other irregularity. Also, copies of all other reports made by persons employed to examine certain land offices.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 30, 1838.

Mr. NORVELL presented six petitions from sundry citizens of Michigan, praying that appropriations may be made for the construction of a military road from Dearbornville to Brest, on Lake Erie; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McKEAN presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to the erection of a dry dock in the Navy Yard at Philadelphia; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the president and directors of the Bank of Alexandria, pray for an extension of their charter;

Also, the petition of a number of the citizens of Washington, praying for the construction of a pavement of wood on Pennsylvania avenue; both of which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN said that he had received from his Excellency, the Governor of Ohio, a communication enclosing a resolution of the General Assembly of that State, which he rose to present to the Senate. The General Assembly had, he said, in this resolution, expressed their opinion that the State possessed all the local advantages necessary to entitle her to the location, within her limits, of the National Armory contemplated by Congress. He fully concurred in this opinion, and should, to the utmost of his power, act in conformity with it.

The Legislature of several other States had passed resolutions, and the people of numerous cities and towns had forwarded to Congress memorials during the present session, setting forth their respective claims, as sites for the foundry and arsenals which are also in contemplation.

These resolutions and memorials had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the committee had asked to be discharged from the further consideration of them, and that they be laid upon the table, in consequence of having previously reported to the Senate a bill embracing all those works, as well as an armory to be established in the West. This bill, the Senate would recollect, proposed to establish one foundry, one armory in the West, an arsenal in each of the States in which there now existed none, and a depot of arms and munitions of war in Missouri, Arkansas, and Wisconsin; and it refers the selection of sites for all these establishments to the President.

In thus requiring the selection of these sites to be made under the direction of the President, the committee yielded to the conviction that to fix them by law would be utterly impracticable, as had been evinced by repeated failures, within the last twenty years, to fix the site for a western armory by an act of Congress. As often as any one point has been proposed in a bill as the most eligible site, innumerable other points were immediately proposed as still more eligible; and each member refusing to surrender the claims of his particular State or district, the bill has gone down under the pressure of the contest. Such being our past experience, and such the bill now reported by the committee, Mr. ALLEN said that it remained for him only to give the resolution he had presented the same direction which had been given to the other resolutions and memorials to which he had referred. He, therefore, moved that the resolution be read, laid upon the table, and printed; and said, that should the bill become a law, he should take measures to present the claims of Ohio to the consideration of the Executive in the strongest light, and press them with all the energy which truth would allow.

Mr. LINN rose to ask whether there was a provision in the bill for a depot in Missouri. He would merely remark that two years ago an appropriation passed Congrsss for a depot in that State, and that it was now building. If this bill provided for another, it was, he presumed, put in by the committee through inadvertence.

Mr. ALLEN said that he presumed it was put in through inadvertence, as it was not intended to establish another depot in that State.

Mr. LINN said he had forborne to say any thing on the subject of the memorials presented here, or of stating the superior advantages possessed by his State, to entitle her to the location of the contemplated armory within her limits. The bill referred the selection of the sites to the President, who was to cause suitable examinations to be made, and he had, therefore, forborne from even mentioning the claims of Missouri, believing that there could not be the slightest difficulty in fixing on Missouri after the examination was made. He was perfectly willing to leave the matter to the President.

Mr. ALLEN said that it was with pride and pleasure he admitted, and that he congratulated Congress and the whole American people upon the fact, that every member of the Senate could rise in his place, and with sincerity and truth ascribe to his own particular State such beauties and resources as but few other portions of the globe enjoyed. Whatever might be the diversity of opinions with regard to the comparative advantages of the several States, he gloried in beholding no single feature upon the broad face of our country without charms to allure, and bounties to reward, the honest labor of man with plenty, security and happiness. He should not, at this time, depart from the order of business to delineate the beauties or disclose the resources of the young, powerful, and magnificent State from which he came; nor should he now attempt to measure the water-power, both natural and artificial, which streams along her fruitful surface, or the exhaustless minerals that lie beneath it. These things are, to some extent, known to all the Western Senators, as also to some others, who have traversed that region.

The resolutions were then read.

Mr. KING could not but admire the great forbearance of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. LINN] who forbore to urge the claims of his State, because he was satisfied that, when an examination was made, she would have the preference. Now, as it seemed to be the fashion of the day for gentlemen to make a display of the advantages possessed by the States they represented, he would merely advert to one circumstance to show that the claims of his State were not behind those of Missouri, or any other. A distinguished gentleman, whom the Senator from Missouri would at once acknowledge to be one of the most intelligent observants and judicious men in the country, [Gen. Jackson,] was of the opinion that this establishment should be located in the State of Alabama, at the foot of the Muscle shoals, where minerals, water power, and facility of transportation, existed to the greatest degree. He hoped that the Senator from Missouri would allow some weight to the opinions of the distinguished gentleman who stood so high in his estimation, and that he would abate some little of his confidence in the superior advantages of Missouri over the other Western States. He further indulged the hope that the present President would not, after the examination was made, overlook the claims of Alabama.

Mr. LINN laughingly observed, that he had great respect for the opinions of Gen. Jackson in such matters; but that distinguished individual certainly could not have reflected that there was such a place as Missouri at the time, or he never could have made the remark. He would maintain, there was not such a spot in any State, [Mr. BENTON, in an under tone: "Say in the world."] yes, he would say not in the whole world. He knew of one twenty miles square in that State which would include two iron mountains; which possessed nearly all, if not all, the requisites for armories and foundries. Iron ores of every quality, lead, copper, zinc, sulphur, alum, emery, plumbago, sal nitre, grindstones, and water power to an unlimited extent. Arms could be thence transported by the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, to the western frontier by the Missouri, Arkansas, and Red rivers and their tributaries, and to the northern lakes by the Illinois, Wisconsin, and Ohio rivers. He said he felt confident that when the capacities of Missouri for such a work were examined into, the claims of the other Western States would sink into insignificance.

Mr. ALLEN asked the Senator from Missouri if there were not in some parts of his State to be found cannon and muskets already made.

Mr. BENTON said in an under tone, that there was a river in his State called "Cannon Ball river," from the circumstance of there being found in it an abundance of round stones in the shape of cannon balls.

Mr. CLAY of Ala. presented the petition of Brig. Gen. Wm. W. Garrard, asking indemnity for horses purchased for the service of the United States during the war with the Creek Indians in the year 1836; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Samuel Milligan, reported the same without amendment; and, on motion of Mr. W. it was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill from the House, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the United States for the year 1838, reported the same with an amendment, and gave notice that he should call up this bill to-morrow, at the earliest moment after the consideration of the morning's business.

On motion of Mr. PIERCE, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John Edwards, the widow of Elisha Patterson, Ebenezer Hecock, the daughter of Col. Abram Morgan, Lemuel Patterson and Alexander McAlister, Jesse Cline and Gillis Hitt.

Mr. P. from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of David Walrod; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The following resolutions were submitted:

By Mr. NORVELL:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to make to the Senate a statement,

1st. Of the amount of money now in the banks, or under the charge of the Department, or of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or of any other officer or person attached to, or connected with, the War Department, belonging to any Indian or tribe, or band of Indians, or Indian traders; specifying the Indian or Indians to which each portion of such money belongs, and the treaty under which the money has been received, and the terms and conditions upon which, and the object or objects for which it remains in the care and keeping of the Government, or of any officer or agent thereof.

2d. Of the present condition of such money, whether any and what portions of it have been invested, in what securities, for what terms of time, at what rates of interest, when and where payable, at what dates respectively such investments were made, what were the respective values in the market of the securities in which any such investments have been made at the times when the investments were taken; whether any portions of such money remain uninvested, and, if uninvested, whether they are deposited in banking institutions; and, if so, in what banks, and upon what terms; and, if not so deposited, in whose hands and care they now are, and upon what terms, as to security, interest, and the like.

Mr. LINN offered the following; which was adopted.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the bust of Thomas Jefferson (now in the Library of Congress) on a mass of iron ore, which was sent for the purpose from the Iron Mountain, by the people of the town of Caledonia, Washington county, Missouri.

Mr. L. said that this ore had been brought on by him for the express purpose named in the resolution, and which he admitted ought to have been presented before. The expense had been paid by the citizens of Caledonia, who had expressed their desire that the bust should be placed on it as a tribute of their respect for the memory of that great man under whose auspices Louisiana was acquired, the vast resources of which were every day becoming more and more developed.

On motion of Mr. LYON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Grand Rapids, in Kent county, to Ionia, in Ionia county, in the State of Michigan.

The bill from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1838, was read twice, and on motion of Mr. BENTON, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRUNDY submitted a substitute for the graduation bill, by way of an amendment, which by general consent, was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of William R. Taylor, administrator of Jonathan Taylor, deceased, was taken up, and after a debate, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were severally read the third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill to revive and continue in force the act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war; and

The bill giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty with Spain.

The bill for the prevention and punishment of duelling in the District of Columbia was taken up, the question being on the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary.

[The following brief synopsis of the debate is given, until the speeches on the occasion can be written out.]

Mr. CLAYTON expressed his objections to duelling in a very pointed manner, and his sincere desire to do all in his power to suppress it. He very much doubted, however, the efficacy of the bill before them. Such was the severity of some of its provisions that it would be next to impossible to procure convictions under it. And there were other objections which he could not reconcile to his mind. One of the provisions sought to make the sending of a challenge felony, which was only a misdemeanor in the eye of the common law. Mr. CLAYTON argued the subject at considerable length, lated to subserve the purposes for which they were intended. While he admitted the practice of duelling to be both illegal and immoral, yet he said it was not of that class of crimes which should subject offenders to the cells of a penitentiary, and make them the associates of the vilest felons. There has nothing in the offence that was either base, mean, or sordid; neither were those likely to be engaged in it, persons who we would dare to send to a penitentiary to be classed with thieves and vagabonds. The moral sense of the community would be shocked at such a measure, and such a law would be rendered a mere nullity, from the interference of the Executive perogative. He deprecated duelling as much as any man could do, and was disposed to go all reasonable lengths to prevent it. On the whole, he believed some legal provision necessary. If he could get the modification he desired, he would vote for the bill as amended by the Judiciary Committee, although he sincerely believed it would not have the good effect its friends designed.

Mr. PRENTISS replied at some length, contending that the practice of duelling was condemned by all laws, human and divine; that it was regarded as a crime by every Government in Christendom, was subversive of the great principles of the Christian religion, and ought not to be tolerated by any Christian people. Mr. P. looked as much to the moral power that this law would have, as to its penal enactments. He asked if any man of honor could allow himself to fight a duel after the passage of such a law? The subject was, in his opinion, a momentous one. We were acting not for the present time, but the passage of this bill would have its due weight on all after generations. The people of this country expect, nay, demand of us, some enactment by which this odious and sinful practice may be discontinued and for ever prevented.

Mr. LINN was of opinion that the Senator from Delaware had treated the subject with so much sound practical sense, that little else could be left to be said on the subject. What community (said Mr. L.) could be found that would pronounce a man either a murderer or felon, who might have chanced to kill another in fair and equal combat? No man, he was persuaded, that came to act on his responsibility as a juror would be prepared to render such a verdict. Many of the States had passed severe penal enactments in relation to this matter, and yet where was the State where such laws had been carried into effect? Other legislatures again had sought milder remedies, such as punishing duelling by disfranchising their citizens, rendering them forever after incapable of holding offices of profit or trust, honor or emolument; such laws, he maintained, had a more wholesome action than those severe, unjust and cruel enactments, because the one was generally carried into effect, while the other was little better than a dead letter. To illustrate the effect of public opinion on this subject, Mr. L. instanced a case in his own State, where the people were as much adverse to fighting as those of any other in the Union, (though he was aware that a contrary opinion prevailed among many in relation to Missouri,) where a small man, for a supposed offence, was cruelly lashed by a large one, the result of which was a challenge on the part of the small one to fight, in which duel the large man was shot twice, the last wound mortal. The survivor was found guilty under the laws of Missouri, when a petition was gotten up, signed almost unanimously by the people, and presented to the Legislature, which body remitted the penalties almost by acclamation; and so Mr. L. said it would be in all like cases, either the Legislature or Executive would step in to counteract the law. If such a bill could be introduced as would strike at the root of the evil, it would cheerfully have his support. He was aware that duelling was not defensible on principles of Christianity, neither was national warfare; and yet how frequently had it been engaged in, and justly too, by Christian nations. All the Legislatures of the Union have concurred in denouncing the practice of duelling as evil in itself, and yet have we not seen them come in to stay the laws. From what little he had seen, it appeared to him that fighting was like marrying, the more barriers that were erected against it, the surer were they to come together.

Mr. SMITH spoke long and vehemently in favor of the bill, maintaining that all enactments against crime had grown out of some past act of villany that shocked the moral sense of the community. The object of this law was not so much to prevent those fond of duelling from engaging in it, as to protect those coming from States where the people were not fond of murder or killing in any shape. For his own part he was not afraid of any man with pistol or sword; but he advocated the bill to protect the representatives of New England from those gentlemanly assassins or banditti, who might seek to call them out for words spoken in debate, and shoot them in a fair and gentlemanly manner. Mr. S. alluded, in no measured terms, to the late transaction, in which a representative had lost his life; and said, if the instigator of that murder had been in Connecticut, he would no more have escaped than if he had gone up and shot down his victim in the street. Mr. S. was for arresting this practice in its incipiency, by striking at once at the root of the evil, and making all persons, however remotely concerned, punishable. He thought the man that advised to such a step was as bad as the principal, and would treat him accordingly. Mr. S. could not draw any distinction between a murder in a duel, and out of it; and he maintained there was none, save that which grew out of the morbid imagination of gentlemen on such matters. Was not the effect the same to the bereaved wife—the children, made orphans? and was not the moral sense of the commumunity alike shocked? These were questions for the advocates of duelling to answer. He thought the country bound to erect some barrier against this infamous system, or, by-and-by, the people, who send their representatives to Congress, would have to accompany them with a body guard, armed with swords and pistols for their protection. If a man would, in contravention of the laws of God and man, seek to fight duels, he (Mr. S.) was clear for inflicting upon him that punishment which should be meted to the criminal of the worst dye.

Mr. CLAYTON spoke some time in favor of an amendment which he offered, to wit: subjecting persons engaged in a duel to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, and a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and to be made forever after ineligible to any office within the gift of the Government. Mr. C. dwelt on the efficacy of such laws in his own State, where duelling was once quite common, but had now entirely ceased. Even the shooting of pistols, which had been practised as an amusement, had, since the passage of the law, gone entirely out of fashion.

Mr. LINN repudiated the idea of denouncing men as murderers and felons, because they had fought duels. Some of the purest and best men on earth had been engaged in them, and should not be so stigmatized. That some duels had taken place from light and insufficient causes, was not to be denied, and certainly was much to be regretted. The question was, how is the practice to be prevented? Mr. L. would answer, not from cruel and sanguinary laws, which in all cases remained a dead-letter on the statute books. Where was there an instance of their being carried into effect? In no case could a jury of twelve men be found to give a decision that would doom a man to the gallows, or the loathsome cells of a penitentiary, and brand his name with the infamous epithets of murderer or assassin, because he had killed another fairly in a duel. Mr. L. thought there were cases of deadly insult which few men would not be ready, at all risks, to resent; and, if he could be allowed to judge from the unusual warmth and the temper displayed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] in this matter, that he would be as willing and ready as any man to come forward on all proper occasions.

Mr. GRUNDY felt disposed to act in this matter without reference to any occurrences of recent date; he had found it best in all subjects of legistion, not to allude to topics calculated to excite. In the year 1829, an act, (which he had some agency in compiling,) somewhat similar to this in its provisions, was passed by the Legislature of Tennessee, providing for the punishment of not less than three nor more than ten years' confinement. There was also some penalty inflicted upon the sending of a challenge, and he thought that law had acted beneficially, as duels were certainly less frequent in his State since its passage. Mr. G. thought if this bill were passed, or something like it, in its provisions, that it would have a powerful effect on public opinion, and certainly no man that voted for it, could ever fight a duel afterwards. All the Senate could do, was to provide such enactments as were deemed best calculated to put a stop to the practice, though he was aware that, after all their care, cases might arise where the laws would not be likely to bind. Duelling had no advocates in the abstract, and all united in condemning it, and yet there were times when it was persisted in notwithstanding. Mr. G. could not agree with Senators that the difficulty of conviction in such cash rested with the juries, as such persons were generally opposed to it; but he rather thought it owing to the difficulty of obtaining proof to convict. The seconds were in the eye of the law particeps criminis, and either would not attend; or if they did, under the plea of not criminating themselves, would refuse to answer. He was not prepared to say that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware might not have the happiest effect, for the thought of being deprived of the power to hold office was a severer punishment in the eyes of some people, even than ten years confinement in the penitentiary.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed, and the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business at four o'clock, and remained until near five; and then

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, March 31, 1838.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, from the Committee on Accounts, made a report, concluding with the following resolution, the further consideration of which was postponed till Monday next:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives appoint a competent number of pages for the service of the House, not exceeding twelve, and between the ages of twelve and sixteen years, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House one dollar and fifty cents per day in full for their services.

That the Doorkeeper appoint a competent number of messengers and servants for the service of the House, not exceeding sixteen in number, who shall receive, in like manner, two dollars per day in full for their services.

That the said Clerk and Doorkeeper shall reduce the number of pages and messengers by them to be appointed, whenever it may appear to them that a less number can perform the duties assigned to them.

That it shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper to assign to the said pages and messengers their duties and services, and to have the same performed, and, in case any page shall neglect his duty, to report the same to the Clerk, who shall discharge him, or make a proper reduction of pay for such neglect.

That it shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper, whenever any new furniture or repairs of the old furniture of the House of Representatives be needed, to apply to the Commissioner of Public Buildings, who shall, if in his opinion it be necessary, give a written order to the Doorkeeper to have the same procured, and the Doorkeeper shall procure such furniture and repairs, on the best terms on which the same can be had, and shall report to the Commissioner the particulars of such furniture and repairs, and said Commissioner shall carefully examine the same, and report to the Clerk his estimate of the value of said furniture and repairs, and the same shall be by him reported to the Committee of Accounts.

That the Doorkeeper shall, immediately after the adjournment of the House, on each day of its session, cause the paper, candles, and other stationery and property of the House to be saved and preserved, so that no part shall be destroyed or used, except for the use of the members of the House.

That it shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper to have all documents and papers which may be printed by order of the House, folded and printed before the speeches or other documents of members.

That the officers of the House or pages or messengers shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any contract for the supply of stationery or any furniture or property, or work done for the use of the House.

That it shall be the duty of the Doorkeeper to collect, at the end of each session, all inkstands, sand-boxes, paper cutters, seals, and other stationery of the House, and to take an inventory of the same, and the same to keep and preserve for the use of the House; and no new stationery shall be purchased except to supply deficiencies, and no old stationery shall be sold or disposed of, except it be damaged or injured, so as to be unfit for use, (and then only by order of the Committee of Accounts.) And when a successor shall be appointed, to deliver over to him the stationery and other property of the House, with the inventory thereof.

That the Doorkeeper shall hire, at the lowest price for what they can be had, a suitable number of horses for the transportation and distribution of the mail of the House to and from the Post Office, and to the lodgings of the members, and for such other necessary business as may be, from time to time, required; and he shall superintend the faithful performance of the duties of the messengers employed in this service; and shall report to the Clerk of the House a statement of the persons employed, and the terms of the contract, which shall be reported to the Committee of Accounts; and the Doorkeeper, or other officer of the House, shall not be directly or indirectly interested in any such contract or undertaking.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House shall, at the commencement of each session of Congress, designate to the Secretary of the Treasury some safe and suitable bank, or place of deposite, in which the Secretary of the Treasury shall deposit the money for the mileage and per diem pay of the members of the House of Representatives, subject to be drawn out by the check of the Speaker, endorsed by the member of the House entitled to mileage and per diem pay.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep the accounts for pay and mileage of the members of the House, to prepare checks for members, and, if required to do so, to draw the money on such checks for the members, the same being previously signed by the Speaker, and endorsed by the member in whose favor the same may be drawn, and pay over the same to the member entitled thereto.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms give bond, with security, to the United States, in a sum not less than five, nor more than ten thousand dollars, at the discretion of the Speaker, and with such security as the Speaker may approve of, faithfully to account for the money coming into his hands for the pay of the members of the House; and that, as a compensation for his increased duties and liabilities, he be allowed the sum of three hundred dollars, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution of Mr. HOPKINS.

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same, by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof, as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed, also, to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the Government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. HOPKINS made a brief rejoinder to Mr. CUSHMAN'S remarks of yesterday, and adduced some additional arguments in support of the proposition, both as a question of economy and for the preservation of the purity of the public press, by its disconnection from the patronage of the Government.

Mr. BOND followed on the same side, and went into a number of statistics and details on the subject, but, before he concluded, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, the House passed to the orders of the day.

Several bills from the Senate were read twice and appropriately referred.

The bill from the Senate for giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain being twice read—

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN moved to refer it to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HOWARD, in a few remarks, explained the reasons why this bill should not go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands, as being the most appropriate committee; when

Mr. JOHNSON withdrew his motion to commit it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN then explained the reason why he thought the bill ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

After a few remarks by Messrs. RICE GARLAND and WILLIAMS of N. C.

Mr. CRAIG moved to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

After a few words by Messrs. LAWLER, JOHNSON of La. HOWARD, HARLAN, POPE, aad RICE GARLAND, the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was disagreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PRIVATE ORDERS.

Mr. SHIELDS, with a view of facilitating the business of the House, moved that the House take up all bills which will not give rise to debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped this course would not be pursued, because it would block up the whole business before the committee of which he was a member.

Objection being made to this mode of proceeding, the House pursued the usual course.

The House then took up the bill for the relief of John Downs; which was read a third time and passed.

The House next took up the bill for the relief of A. Quertier and Albert, of New Orleans; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, the bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 2, 1838.

DECEASE OF THE HON. ISAAC McKIM.

As soon as the journal of Saturday had been read—

Mr. HOWARD rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to perform a duty, the painful extent of which I did not fully appreciate until the present moment. It is from the effort required to control the feelings which are struggling for the mastery, that I am made sensible of the difficulty of the task. Sir, my friend and colleague, who lightened the toils and shared the responsibilities of our joint representation, is no more. After a brief but severe illness, ISAAC McKIM expired yesterday morning, meeting his fate with exemplary resignation and composure. Conscious of his approaching end for many days previous to its occurrence, he looked steadily at death as he drew near, step by step, with that unflinching courage which a quiet conscience only can give. Feeling and knowing, as I now feel and know, that he had tried to do his duty, he looked forward without alarm, because he looked backward without self-reproach. His course through life had been the same as his conduct in this House, where, I am sure, he has not left an unkind feeling in the breast of a single member. Engaged in the active pursuits of commerce from an unusually early period of life, he was one, and perhaps the last, of that enterprising class of merchants, whose hazardous, but successful, industry, some thirty years ago, built up, at the same time, their own fortunes and the prosperity of the city which we partly represented upon this floor; but the liberality with which he dispensed his gains around him, was equal to the sagacity which he manifested in their acquisition. Two public schools, one founded by his father and the other by himself, have long made his name blessed by the destitute widow, to whose children the rich gift of education was thus benevolently and wisely imparted. The two hundred orphan boys who have habitually attended the school of ISAAC McKIM, may perhaps be unconscious of the loss which they have sustained; but the tears of their widowed mothers, shed in secret sorrow, will attest their mingled gratitude and regret. Sir, to rescue from the temptations and dangers of idleness and ignorance, any portion of the youth of our country, is to effect a work in which patriotism and philanthropy eminently unite. But it was not in this instance alone that the kindheartedness of my deceased friend was manifested. I cannot call to mind a single individual in our extensive population whose loss will be more felt or deplored. He has passed through life with such an unstained character, that all men of integrity knew him to be their proper associate. Mild and courteous in his deportment towards others, he followed, as a guide in his own conduct, that sincerity and honesty of purpose, upon which his friends never counted in vain.

Next to his family, Mr. Speaker, his loss falls most heavily upon myself. Elected by the same constituency, we have been, for some years, in the habit of the most unreserved communication with each other upon every topic relating to our public duties, and upon his strong sagacity I have been accustomed greatly to rely. His untiring attention to business has long been conspicuous in this House. No care, no time, no labor seemed to him too great to be devoted to the public service. In this House, amongst his constituents, in his State, and by his country, his absence will be felt. It only remains for us to pay such respect to his memory as is due to it, and, for that purpose, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the members and officers of this House will attend the funeral of ISAAC McKIM, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Resolved unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of ISAAC McKIM, deceased.

Resolved unanimously, That the members and officers of this House will testify their respect for the memory of ISAAC McKIM by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved unanimously, That when the House adjourn to-day, it will adjourn to meet again on Wednesday next.

The resolutions having been unanimously adopted, the House adjourned over till Wednesday, meeting to-morrow, (Tuesday,) at eleven o'clock, to attend the funeral obsequies of the late Mr. McKIM.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LEGARE in the Chair, and took up

The bill for the relief of Joseph Nourse, which was passed over, leaving it to keep its place on the calendar.

The committee next took up the bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, which was passed over without being amended.

The committee then took up the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others; which, after a few remarks by Mr. CAMBRELENG and Mr. RUSSELL, was passed over without any action being had upon it.

The committee next took up the bill for the relief of Elisha Moreland, William Kennedy, and others; which, after some discussion by Messrs. BOND, LINCOLN, CHAPMAN, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the committee rose and reported to the House the bill for the relief of Thomas Fillebrown, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next.

Messrs. WILLIAMS and LAWLER, on leave, presented petitions.

On motion,

The House then adjourned.

Also, two memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, on the subject of slavery: the question as to receiving them being laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of several petitions for pensions that had been referred to them

The bill for the relief of Samuel Milligan, was read the third time, and passed.

The amendment of the House to the bill directing the expenditure of the appropriation for removing the troops of the United States from Fort Gibson, was considered, and concurred in.

The bill from the House for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, was read twice, and referred.

The bill from the House for the relief of Ebenezer A. Lester, was taken up and considered, and, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, it was indefinitely postponed.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill to remunerate the captors of the privateer Lydia.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Wellborn, jr. and William Wellborn.

The bill for the relief of William Eadus.

The bill for the relief of David H. Maxwell.

The bill for the relief of Moses Van Campen; and

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Everard Mead, deceased.

DEATH OF THE HON. ISAAC McKIM.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FRANKLIN, their Clerk, announcing the death of the Hon. ISAAC McKIM, a member of that House from the State of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from their hall at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GRUNDY rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In the absence of both the Senators from Maryland, I have been requested by the delegation in the other House from that State to move a concurrence with the resolutions of the House of Representatives, in honor of the memory of the deceased.

A few days since he was amongst us, in all the vigor of health. Within a few hours only before his death, he was actually engaged in the faithful discharge of the arduous duties assigned him by his country. He is now gone; and those who esteemed him and loved him, will see him no more.

Mr. McKIM was emphatically the author of his own fortunes. He commenced life in very moderate circumstances, without the patronage of influential friends. His industry and energy, under the guidance of a clear and discriminating intellect, enabled him to amass a fortune, not only ample, but magnificent.

He not only knew how to acquire property, but he knew how to use it. The accumulation of wealth in him did not beget the passion of avarice. Go to the city of his residence, and the inhabitants can point out innumerable instances of his noble charities, and monuments of his munificence and liberality.

He had reached a good old age. He had been honored by his fellow-citizens with a seat in the Senate of his State, and he had often been elected to fill the station he lately occupied. We his associates knew that, although he was unassuming and unpretending, he brought into our councils a stock of useful and practical knowledge possessed by few men.

The reflection that he lived worthily, and died probably without a single enemy, will comfort, and in some degree alleviate the sorrows, of her who was the partner of his bosom and sharer of his joys and griefs, and those relatives and friends who now deplore his loss.

Mr. GRUNDY then submitted the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously:

Resolved unanimously, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. ISAAC McKIM, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

The Senate adjourned to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. WISE asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of repealing the laws providing for an exploring expedition, and of converting, by law, the vessels fitted out for the said expedition, into a squadron to be stationed on the Atlantic coast of the United States, to ascertain the soundings of its shoals, inlets, channels, bays, rivers, creeks, and harbors; to instruct the officers of the navy in the pilotage of our own waters; to train them in seamanship; to afford relief to vessels in distress; and to protect our coast.

Objection being made,

Mr. MONTGOMERY, premising that this was a subject of considerable importance, moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. WISE remarked, that the adoption of the resolution instanter was indispensable, inasmuch as the appropriations for the expedition were already embraced in the annual navy bill.

The House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina asked leave to submit the following:

Resolved, That this House will, from and after Monday next, meet daily at 11 o'clock, a. m. until otherwise ordered.

Objection being made,

Mr. G. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 29. So the rules were suspended.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio then moved to amend the resolution, so as to take a daily recess from 2 till half-past 3 o'clock.

After some remarks from Messrs. CAMBRELENG, WHITTLESEY of Connecticut, REED, POPE and BOON in opposition to the amendment, and by Messrs. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and REED in its support,

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused; and it was further discussed by Messrs. LEGARE, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and CAMBRELENG in opposition, when the amendment was rejected without a division, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWSON then rose and said that, as a member of the Committee on Mileage, he had reported a bill on that subject, which it was absolutely necessary should be either passed or rejected. He, therefore, moved a suspension of the rules, in order to take up and consider that bill, but the House refused.

DUTIES OF OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

Pursuant to order, the House took up the resolutions in relation to the duties of the officers of the House.

[They are published at length in the "Globe" of Saturday evening last.]

The resolutions having been read, the first was taken up, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives appoint a competent number of pages, not exceeding twelve, and between the ages of twelve and sixteen years, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, one dollar and fifty cents per day, in full for their services.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to amend the first, so that it should not affect the pages now in the employ of the House, by limiting its operation to the next session of Congress.

Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland, JOHNSON of Virginia, and CONNOR spoke briefly against the amendment, when it was agreed to—ayes 67, noes 62.

Mr. HAYNES moved further to amend the first resolution, by giving the appointment of the pages to the Doorkeeper instead of to the Clerk.

Mr. ADAMS moved to add the words, "with the approbation of the Speaker," which Mr. H. accepted as a modification.

After some remarks from Messrs. HAYNES, ADAMS, JOHNSON of Maryland, and MASON of Ohio, the amendment was agreed to, 73 to 51.

Mr. CONNOR moved that ten boys be employed, instead of the proposed number of twelve, which was disagreed to.

The other resolutions were also discussed at great length, amended, and, in their amended form, severally concurred in.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1838 was taken up.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Finance, being under consideration:

Add to the end of first section, Provided, That there shall exist in the President and the Postmaster General the same power to transfer funds from one to another head of appropriation between the appropriations above made for the service of the General Post Office, as exists in the President and any other head of an Executive department to transfer funds appropriated under one head to the service of another, in any other branch of the public service.

After some remarks from Mr. CRITTENDEN, in opposition to the amendment, and from Messrs. WRIGHT, NILES, and GRUNDY, in its support, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to amend the bill by inserting a proviso that the above appropriations for the Post Office Department, together with the salary of the Postmaster General, shall be paid out of the revenues of the Post Office which are or may be paid into the Treasury agreeably to the act of 2d July, 1836.

After some remarks from Messrs. GRUNDY, WRIGHT, and NILES, in opposition to the amendment, and from Mr. CRITTENDEN, in its support, the question was taken, and the motion to amend was lost without a division.

The amendment was then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill, as amended, to be read a third time.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL,

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 5, 1838.

Mr. PATTON moved the following, which was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That WILLIAM J. M'CORMICK be appointed postmaster of this House.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

Mr. McKENNAN then asked the consent of the House to take up the resolution providing for the election of a principal Doorkeeper on Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Objection being made, the rules were suspended, 92 to 34.

Mr. GRAY then moved to insert to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped this motion would not prevail. There were several urgent appropriation bills before the House, and this was the only public business day of the present week.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 69, noes 73.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky said he thought there were officers enough already, and he therefore moved to postpone the resolution till the first Monday in December next.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOON stated, briefly, why he should vote for the postponement. He dissented from the principle involved in this question; for, independent of the House having got along very well with the present Assistant Doorkeeper for the best part of three sessions, there was another principle in it still stronger, viz: that the House did, on the annunciation of the death of the late Doorkeeper, direct his full salary to be paid to his widow till the end of the present session of Congress. Mr. B. did not envy the widow at all; but the same principle would apply as forcibly, and with as much justice, to every member of the House who might die during his term of service, and his per diem for the whole session paid to the widow. Now, he could not go for this principle, and more especially with the lash over him for extravagance, and the comparisons recently made between the expenditures of the House under this and the late Administrations, and former ones, every small and trifling item having been industriously enumerated. If other gentlemen were disposed to do so, they had a perfect right, and on them would rest the responsibility of paying a double salary for the performance of the duties of one officer.

After a few words from Messrs. HAYNES, EWING, BRONSON, and TAYLOR, against postponement, and a brief rejoinder by Mr. BOON, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 91.

So the House refused to postpone the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky then moved to amend it by adding the following:

Resolved further, That the office of Assistant Doorkeeper, from and after the election of Doorkeeper, be dispensed with. Lost.

Mr. RUSSELL then moved to amend by striking out "on Monday next, at 2 o'clock," and inserting "forthwith;" which was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Before the House proceeded to ballot—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, moved the following order: "That in the ballotings for Doorkeeper the individual who receives the smallest vote shall be dropped, and so on," but it was disagreed to.

The House then proceeded, and the following nominations were made:

The Senate took up and considered, as in committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Fisher, deceased.

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the bill, by adding interest, at the rate of six per cent.; and after a debate, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. BAYARD and CLAYTON, and opposed by Messrs. WHITE and NILES, this amendment was rejected—yeas 10, nays 20; after which, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BENTON laid on the table the statement of the Missouri volunteers relative to the battle of Okechobee, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire whether any additional supplies will be needed by the Treasury during the present year; and if so, to inquire into the expediency of raising said supplies, by selling the bonds given by the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania for the United States stock in the late United States Bank, or by loans.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route direct from Palmyra, Missouri, to Shelbyville, the seat of justice of Shelby county.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge to fight a duel in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. PRESTON said he had no objection to the passage of a law against duelling, although he believed that the common law, if properly enforced, was abundantly sufficient. It might be that additional legislation was necessary to enforce it; but if so, it was worthy the consideration of gentlemen who urged this measure, whether the insufficiency of the common law was not induced by a state of public opinion, (whether intelligent or not he would not stop to inquire) which was averse to the stern execution of the law applicable to duelling. If this were so, the object which gentlemen had in view would not be attained by the introduction of other and sterner penalties. On the contrary, he (Mr. P.) thought they made the law more inefficient when they made it more severe, because it became more opposed to public sentiment.

The practice of duelling, Mr. P. said, originated in, and was sustained by, public opinion; and so long as it was so sustained, it would prevail, in despite of law, on that principle which had passed into a proverb, that when public opinion set its face against the measure, no law would be requisite. Gentlemen who were advocating this measure, seemed to think that laws against duelling had, in many instances, been successful in suppressing it. In that he thought they were mistaken, at least to the extent of the influence which they claimed for those laws. It might have happened, in a particular case, that public opinion, by some gross abuse of the practice, had been so raised against it, that the enactment of new laws had strengthened and consolidated the feeling of the community, so as to bring the institution of duelling into disrepute. Such was the case in Virginia; but whether that State had succeeded in checking the passions which gave rise to challenges, or had merely forced them into some more violent forms of ebullition, remained yet to be seen.

Duelling had undoubtedly produced much folly and much misery, but at the same time it had mitigated the indulgence of revengeful passions, which, taking the milder and more deliberate course, evaporated entirely, or assumed a less atrocious form. Was it not, asked Mr. P. manifestly less outrageous upon receiving offence to send a challenge than to draw a dirk? Time could then be had for reflection—for adjustment; but even should the affair be pushed to the extreme issue, there were circumstances and chances which would go to make it less objectionable than sudden and violent personal rencontres. It was not his purpose to vindicate the practice of duelling, or to enter into a full discussion of the proposed law, but merely to notice some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, which he had heard with great regret, and which he must be permitted to say with some little degree of indignation. That gentleman had thought proper to indulge himself in no measured terms of denunciation against the actors in a recent event, which the whole community deplored, and coupled with this indecorous attack upon the gentleman, whose conduct is at this moment the subject of investigation before the branch of the National Legislature. The very extraordinary declaration that this law is intended to protect the North against the South—protect [said Mr. P.] the North against the South!! Mr. President, the gentleman is under a mistake, a grievous mistake! He thinks that if a gentleman from the South challenges one from the North, the latter must fight; that there is no escape, that his fate is settled, his doom fixed! Not so, sir! not, so. I am happy to relieve the honorable Senator from so painful a delusion. The fighting a duel is matter of mutual consent. It is a rencontre agreed upon, and deliberately arranged, by both parties. The challenged party agrees to be shot at, and agrees to shoot at the challenger; and, if indeed he had been rightfully informed, the challenged party had a wider field of selection and more important objects of choice than his adversary. The challenged party first decided whether he would fight, then the time, the place, weapons, distance, every thing according to his own wishes, and if he falls, it is by means which he thought least dangerous to himself, and most so for his antagonist. This voluntary agency seemed to have escaped the attention of the Senator. The mutual design and mutual capacity to kill have not been understood by him, nor has the very great advantage of being the challenged party—the advantage of selecting weapons with which he is familiar, and the challenger is not, and by hurrying the time so that familiarity cannot be acquired. It was by omitting to consider such facts that the Senator thought all penalties should be decreed against the challenger, and that all sympathy was to be reserved for the challenged? This very extraordinary error, in point of fact, seemed to pervade all the gentleman's logic, morality, and sensibility. The idea that the challenged party is bound to fight makes it necessary in his judgment to pass a law for the protection of New England. The same idea induced him to stigmatize all the parties on one side, in a recent and most melancholy transaction with all the harshest epithets known to our language, and to charge them with the highest crimes known to our laws. In his (Mr. P's) judgment, the introduction of so paiuful and exciting a topic could produce no good, and the style and temper in which it was treated, was altogether wrong. Every body lamented the sad catastrophe, and he trusted the Senator would find no example or imitators of that bitter spirit which led him to mix up this matter with the rancor of sectional prejudice, and party politics. What justification, in point of morality, what excuse, in point of decency, had the Senator for thus dragging before the Senate, on charges of conspiracy, assassination, and murder, gentlemen who are not here to be heard, and in regard to whom, if the Senator entertained these opinions, it was his duty to bring before a competent tribunal, to have his charges considered and examined—the courts were open to him! But more, much more, than that, said Mr. P. the Senator is aware that at this very moment while he accuses, judges and condemns, under the influence of a heated imagination and roused feelings, the subject of his declamation was undergoing investigation in the other end of the Capitol, before the committee of the House in daily session. I do not, said Mr. P. complain of the bitterness with which the Senator speaks of individuals, that is a matter of taste or temper; but I do take strong exception to the wanton disregard of common justice towards individuals, in condemning them pending their trial, unheard and without testimony. The Senator puts the passage of the law upon the ground of protection of himself and his friends, and at the same moment shows to what extent protection is needed by those whom he may choose to select as the subjects of vituperation. Does the gentleman think that the infliction of physical injury is the only way in which a man can be wronged? Is it less an assault and outrage upon him, to bring him upon this high theatre to be exhibited as a felon than to shoot at him? Is there but one kind of assassination? but one kind of murder? Are bodily wounds those alone which are felt? When Virginia passed a duelling law, she enacted new and wider definitions of slander, which would effectually suppress such expressions as those used by the Senator, if used elsewhere than in a privileged place. When she undertook to suppress duelling, she also essayed to suppress, not only calumny, but also insult; and the great fundamental code of morals, which enjoins that "thou shalt not kill," also enjoins that "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." It inculcates upon us to keep our tongue from evil speaking, and exalts charity as the chiefest of virtues.

Mr. P. contended that his section of the country was as fairly entitled to protection against assaults of that kind as that of the honorable Senator to any assaults from his quarter. He knew how utterly futile was the pretence of sectional protection. It was equally offensive to the North and to the South: it was a mere phantom of the Senator's fancy. He says the people of New England are averse to duelling. If so, he who declines a challenge commends himself to public opinion, and at once satisfies his own conscience and fulfils the expectations of his own friends. The whole business of duelling is an appeal to public opinion. It is a mode by which public opinion regulates and restrains the exercise of that wild justice, as Lord Bacon calls it, which the infirmity of our own nature prompts us to take beyond the justice of the laws, or the morals of the people exempt society from the evils of inordinate passions, whether manifested by abusive language, by personal outrage, or under the forms of duelling. Doubtless, in the absence of the two first, the last would be rarely heard of.

Mr. P's object in troubling the Senate was rather to notice the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut than to discuss the bill. He doubted the necessity for any penalty beyond that of the common law, which had so long been found amply sufficient in England; but if gentlemen thought that additional legislation was necessary, he had no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut rose in reply. He said that, for the purpose of making his views fully understood on this subject, it would be necessary for him to refer occasionally to the late duel, and that his object in doing so was not to create any excitement, or to produce unpleasant feelings in the minds of any persons, whether concerned in the late tragedy or not. It was necessary for him to bring into view that transaction, which was the primary cause of action on the subject in this body, and he wished distinctly to be understood as not intending to make a personal attack on any body. But if truth, which he should endeavor only to advance, should excite such unpleasant feelings, he should regret it, though he would not shrink from doing what he conceived to be his duty on this, as well as on all other occasions. He should not have thought it necessary for him to occupy the time of the Senate on this subject further than he had done, had it not been for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, on which the question arose, whether it was necessary for Congress to pass a law for the purpose of preventing a repetition of that act, which has spread sorrow over this and the other body. If that act was one of common occurrence, if it was one that the American people would submit to, he certainly would not ask Congress to suppress it. If, on the contrary, it was one that was abhorrent to their feelings and principles, and from which the American people sought to be relieved, he certainly should not be prevented from urging the passage of the law. Some remarks made by him on a former occasion seemed to have deeply excited the feelings of the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator was indignant that he had called for the passage of a law to defend the Northern people from the attacks of the Southern. He believed that he did express something like it, and he believed there was a necessity for it. He meant no disrespect to the South. Their habits and feelings were different from those of the North, leading them to feelings and practices which the North condemned. The North had no such code of honor as that spoken of by the Senator from South Carolina, or rather, as he subsequently termed it, an "institution," which justified them in taking the lives of their fellow men on light and trivial occasions. If they had no such code, if they were governed by no such faith, there certainly could be no necessity for passing this law for the purpose of protecting them against themselves; and, therefore, if there was a necessity for passing this law, it must, of course, be for the purpose of protecting them against the South and Southwest, where this institution existed. A man of the North, whose character was not worth a pinch of snuff, who had been charged daily in his own city, and under his own eyes, as being a murderer, a bank partisan, bought up by the bank, is spoken of here in terms infinitely more mild than those used towards him at the North, and uncontradicted by him. How was it? Did not his partner at the time charge him daily with being bought by the bank, and avow that he was a witness to the transaction? And did not a charge thus made, and uncontradicted by him, place him in the same position as his quietude under an insult would at the South? Was he warranted in giving this character to the man who was the principal disturber in this tragedy? How was it that this man, who dared not appeal to the proper tribunal at the North, could come here in the presence of this Congress, select his comrades, (and where, he would ask, were they from,) and enact a scene which they must all deeply deplore? Mr. S. then went on, at some length, to argue the necessity of passing this law for the protection of the representatives from the North who were opposed to duelling. And shall we, he asked, who are the representatives of more than one-half of the people of the United States, be murdered here at the instigation of a worthless character, who has slandered the whole North, and who comes here, selects his member of Congress, and places his dagger in his hand? It was painful to him to recur to the late tragedy near this city, but it was necessary for him to do so for the purpose of illustrating the subject. What was the cause, and the whole cause, of this bloody deed and the loss of a most valuable life? It was merely, and nothing else on earth, because the deceased refused, while a gun was pointed at him, to acknowledge a man to be a gentleman who was told every day, in his own State, that he was a villain, and published as such in half the papers in the country. Now, was this valuable life taken away by a Northern man, or was it taken away by this man himself, who dared not place his character before the proper tribunal of the country, but who came here and selected some instrument for his infamous work? This was the whole cause, and nothing else. The deceased was to be forced to acknowledge what thousands and thousands of persons did not believe to be true.

After some further remarks in which Mr. S. very forcibly commented on the odious practice of duelling, he referred to some remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] in which he dignified the practice as being an institution. Now, if duelling was an institution, he said, they had another institution at the South—that of slavery—to which the North was equally opposed; and it was worth while to observe how the two institutions flourished together. He asked gentlemen to consider this, and make the most of it. He expressed no opinion himself. Mr. S. replied at length to that part of Mr. PRESTON'S argument, duelling sometimes prevented a worse state of things—such as slanderous and abusive language, personal violence, &c. and said that they had a much better institution at the North to prevent all this, which was their courts of justice, and that a resort to them was a better vindication of character, and better protection against violence, than a resort to the duel. He concluded, by saying that he was willing to take the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, if it was supposed that it would afford adequate protection to the representatives of the American people, who were opposed to duelling against those who belonged to the infected districts.

Mr. PIERCE said: In much that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] has said I fully concur; but if I have understood correctly, he has uttered some sentiments which I cannot permit to pass in silence. I cannot permit the idea to be received here, or go abroad, that New England demands or requires special legislation for her protection against any other section of this Union. [Mr. SMITH explained: he had not intended to favor any sectional law; his idea was that the habits of the North required no such law.] Well, sir, I understood the Senator to say that the law was necessary for the protection of the North against the South. I regard it with a broader view. The object is to suppress an evil and immoral practice every where, and the measure most likely to prove efficient in the accomplishment of this object will receive my cordial support; but I cannot admit that the representatives of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, need any laws for their personal protection, which gentlemen from other sections of this Union do not need. The people of New England have shown on more occasions than one, that they well know how to protect the interests, the honor, and the glory of their country; and are the representatives of that people to ask at your hands special protection for themselves? No, sir, never: we may not resist aggression successfully, but to use a part of a phrase that has become proverbial, we'll try to do it. If we fail, we shall not ask you to interpose your shield for our special protection. It was my intention to give a silent vote for the strongest measure having prevention for its object that should be presented; and I do not propose now to discuss the provisions, either of the bill as reported by the committee, or the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] While I am up, I will make a single remark. My action on the occasion, will have no reference to the past. However strong may be my feelings, this, I am admonished, is not the time or place to express them. If I have sorrows deep and abiding, they shall have no utterance here, but be left to Time—

"Comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled."

It has been said, in the progress of this debate, and I fear with too much truth, that penal laws upon this subject in the States, where they have been enacted, have failed to produce the salutary influence that was earnestly to be desired, and probably expected. That the form only has been changed; that street rencontres and assaults have taken the place of duels conducted with the usual ceremony. We are not without some evidence, that even the acceptance of the ordinary forms would not prevent these disgraceful and shocking occurrences. We may be assaulted at our private lodgings by armed assassins; we may have our limbs shattered, or our lives taken upon the streets, for the faithful and fearless discharge of our duties here; but this certainly furnishes no reason for inaction. My main hope, however, I freely confess, of the salutary influence of this bill, if it shall become a law, is that it will come in aid of the moral sense of the community; that it will give tone and strength and power to what I sincerely hope may be public sentiment in relation to this practice. If my wishes shall be realized, it will reach not only duelling, but, through that omnipotent tribunal, (public opinion,) it will reach this relic of barbarism in every form which it can possibly assume. It has been well remarked by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] that those laws which are not sustained by public sentiment cannot be enforced, and consequently remain as a dead letter upon your statute book. Sir, they are worse than a dead letter: they give countenance to iniquity, and boldness to vice.

But if Congress shall do its duty, the law will not be violated with impunity. The power is here, and if properly exerted we may expect the most heart cheering results. Let those privileges, touching the freedom of debate, secured to us by the Constitution for the wisest purposes, be sacredly observed, and let no man, directly or indirectly, become the instrument of their violation. Nay, more: if public sentiment, upon this subject, is in an unsound and unhealthy state, let the work of reformation begin here. Let us check, on its first palpable indication, that spirit, which leads naturally, if not inevitably, to personal conflicts, if indulged in assemblies constituted like the two Houses of Congress. We are here to deliberate, to discuss when we differ, but not to lacerate the feelings of each other by wanton and rude personalities; and let the individual who shall commit the first violation of your rules upon this subject be called instanter to the bar of the House, and required to apologise, on the spot, or be punished by expulsion from the body. I would cheerfully submit to this myself, and I will give my vote to enforce it upon others. This would unquestionably be the most potent, if not the only effectual remedy, so far as Congress is concerned; and if it shall ever be adopted in a single instance, the influence of that instance will not be lost in the remotest corner of this Union. Will it be said your rules cannot be enforced by such severe penalties? How do you expect your severe penal laws to be enforced by others. Have the persons who are to administer the laws a nicer sense of justice and the proprieties of life, or more firmness, than those who make them. I take it gentlemen will hardly admit this. Sir, there is a morbid and unhealthy state of public sentiment here upon this subject. It is not to be disguised The most conclusive evidence of it has been furnished from time to time, ever since I have had the honor of a seat in either House. You know well what is the consequence, if personalities are directed to you, and you allow them to pass in silence. A personal attack leads necessarily to a personal reply—crimination to recrimination, and both to that which we deplore and desire to prevent.

Now, sir, for some of the indications of the state of public sentiment to which I have alluded.

When you are engaged in the discussion of questions of the highest importance, either great measures of policy or principles of constitutional law, calmly, dispassionately, like Senators, where is your audience? What is the condition of your galleries? Comparatively empty. But let notice be given, let it be understood for a single night that reminiscences are to be called up on the following day, that the conduct of gentlemen here is to be carefully criticised and scanned in a manner that must, in all probability, lead to personalities in the highest degree irritating, and what is the scene presented? You have then no naked walls. Galleries and lobbies are crowded almost to suffocation. The privileged seats are occupied eagerly, and at an early hour. Nay, even your passages and doors are literally blockaded. I refer to these things with no pleasure; but they are notorious, and disclose a state of feeling which gives countenance and nourishment to that spirit, which, if indulged, is at least likely to lead to ulterior results deplorable and fatal. I hope to see the day when there will be an instinctive shrinking in both Houses of Congress from any thing like rude personality. If that day shall arrive, we may then expect here, and throughout the country, an end of this practice, which, in the abstract, must be condemned by moral and brave men, in whatever region they may have had their birth, or under whatever influences they may have been educated.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer. I rose merely to say that I give to this measure my cheerful support for the whole Union, for the South as much as for the North; and that when the representatives from my native State upon this floor shall need any special legislation for their personal protection—when they shall cease to defend the honor and the rights of their constituents, and consequently their own, they will be regarded by that people as unworthy of their stations.

Mr. PRESTON said that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIERCE] had entirely relieved him from the necessity of replying to some parts of the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut. Nothing which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire said could be intended to defend his section of country, for it never entered in his mind to throw any reflection on the gallant people of the North and East. If he had forgotten their high reputation for deeds of gallantry, he could never have heard the name of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, or the name of the lamented member of the other House, whose loss they so much deplored, without remembering it.

Mr. P. considered the allusions made by the Senator from Connecticut to the persons engaged in the duel, as altogether unnecessary, indecorous, and improper. He put it to the Senator, whether it was just or proper to bring that into discussion here, which was in a course of investigation before another body. The Senator was an anti-duellist, and did not his denunciations therefore fail, as much upon the unfortunate dead as upon the still more unfortunate survivor. If the survivor had perished, would not those epithets have applied to his antagonist, who voluntarily engaged in the affair, and unfortunately became the victim. Was not the latter as active and efficient an agent as the other, and perhaps more so, as he selected the time and place and weapons? The honorable gentleman seemed to suppose there was some sort of moral coercion. Could he be vilified, abused, hunted from place to place, and published in the newspapers? Now this was the ground taken by all those who sent challenges. They cannot bear to be traduced, to be vilified, to be published in the newspapers, and therefore they send challenges.

Mr. P. after replying at length to the remarks of Mr. SMITH, deprecated his allusions to the persons engaged in the late duel. They were not sitting there as moralists or preachers, but as legislators, and if the decalogue informed us that we shall do no murder, the same decalogue also said "thou shall not bear false witness against thy neighbor." What availed, he asked, all our virtues, if we have not charity.

Mr. GRUNDY spoke at some length against duelling, avowing himself favorable to any bill that would be most likely to suppress a practice alike contrary to the laws of God and man. He maintained that public sentiment was every where against the practice, whether in the North, South, East, or West. Even the very men who fought duels condemned it in their cool and reflecting moments. That measure best calculated to suppress it, therefore, was certainly most to be desired; and upon reflection, he was of opinion that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware would be, after all, the most effectual means of doing so. The original bill made the punishment death, which, he believed, was altered at his suggestion, by the Committee on the Judiciary, to confinement in the penitentiary. The first was supposed too severe, and consequently would not in all probability ever be carried into execution—the second was disgraceful, and not likely from that cause to be often inflicted. Well, what did the gentleman from Delaware propose? Why, in the first place, a fine of two thousand dollars, which to a man fond of his money was something! In the second—he was to be confined in the common jail for a period not exceeding two years! Well, that was something serious also, and likely to make men think of the penalty, when they were about to enter into any such rash engagements. The next proposition was to make them forever after ineligible to any office of profit or trust under the Government. This last proposition, he seriously believed, would have more effect than the fear of death, or horror of the penitentiary. There was the clause that touched them in a tender point. Those who fought duels were generally the young and high spirited, whose sole ambition was to get into power and place: and when they found themselves forever excluded by the passage of such a law, they would be cautious how they infringed its penalties.

Mr. G. went into a long argument to prove that the neglect of communities to punish for duelling, grew more out of the difficulty of proving the facts, than any indisposition to punish. One of the causes why it had not been so punished in this District, was, that, from its limited extent, while preliminaries were settled here, an hour's ride enabled the parties to reach the confines of other States, where all the disastrous consequences occurred. This amendment reached the matter in its incipiency, and he trusted it might be adopted.

Mr. PRENTISS made a few observations in opposition to the amendment. He did not think the punishment it prescribed sufficient to prevent the crime; and he thought it would be partial and unjust in its operation. The disqualification as to office did not apply to members of Congress; and those who would be most apt to commit the offence would be from those sections of the country where duelling was tolerated. The amendment would be, therefore, partial in its operation.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; after which,

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
FRIDAY, April 6, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, on leave, presented the following petitions upon the subject of the late duel, which were referred to the select committee having that subject under consideration: Thomas J. Stone, and 91 others, citizens of East Machias; Timothy Ludden, and 66 others, citizens of Peru; and James Lunt, and 66 others, citizens of Peru; all in the State of Maine.

Mr. HALL asked leave to submit the following resolution, but it was objected to:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the 27th of February last (in addition to any legislative measures they may think proper to recommend for the suppression of duelling) be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by a rule of the House, for the expulsion of any member who, during the term for which he is elected, shall be concerned in a duel, either as principal or accessory, or who shall send, bear, or accept a challenge; and further to inquire into the expediency of providing by another rule of the House for the appointment, at the commencement of each session, of a standing committee, whose duty it shall be, without special direction from the House, to examine summarily into any personal controversy arising between members, or in which a member is a party; and if necessary to the adjustment thereof, to report to the House what order, in their opinion, ought to be taken on the same, providing in such rule for the expulsion or other punishment of any member who shall neglect or refuse to comply with such order as the House may make in the premises.

Petitions for private claims were, on leave, presented by Messrs. SERGEANT and HEROD.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that a member be appointed on the Committee of Ways and Means, to supply the vacancy, occasioned by the decease of the late Hon. ISAAC MC KIM; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. also moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of two memorials—one from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the city of New York, and the other from the City Council of the city of Boston, praying Congress to adopt measures to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers into the country, and that the same be referred to the Select Committee of the House having a similar subject under consideration; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CASEY reported a bill granting a bounty in land to the organized militia men, mounted militia men, mounted men and rangers, who defended the country in the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. YELL reported a bill for the relief of Abraham Stipp of Indiana.

Mr. CRARY rose and said, that some three months ago, the House authorized the printing of five thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. He would be pleased to be informed by some member of the Committee on the Public Lands, at what time the document would be laid upon our tables.

Mr. CASEY stated in reply, that it was upon his motion that the document in question was ordered to be printed. It was a matter in which he had felt some interest, and he had this morning inquired of one of the officers of the House when it would be printed, and had been informed that it would be laid on the tables of members in a few days. It had been delayed on account of the number of maps accompanying the same.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

On this committee being called on for reports,

Mr. WISE rose and begged leave to propound an inquiry to the chairman thereof. Some weeks ago, the House referred to that committee a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of receding this District, and this morning he had received sundry resolutions reported by the Senate of the State of Maryland, expressing a willingness to accept the recession, and the inquiry Mr. W. wished to propound was, whether the committee had prepared, or were preparing, a report on that subject, or whether they intended to report thereon; and if so, when it was probable they would do so. He would merely remark that it was a subject of much importance, and one which had already been gravely discussed by a portion, at least, of the District.

Mr. BOULDIN stated, in reply, that he had been compelled to be absent for some time, owing to domestic circumstances, as he had apprised the House before leaving here. At that time the subject was under investigation before the committee, and under his own deliberate examination, and he could only now state that the committee would make a general response as soon as possible. His own mind was entirely made up, and he was prepared to make his individual answer with regard to the propriety of a recession of the District at any time.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAIG reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Duvall, deceased.

Mr. TALIAFERRO reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Philip Lightfoot.

Mr. McKAY also moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions of the Governor and Legislative Council of Florida, respecting the repairs of Fort Marion and of the sea-wall at St. Augustine, upon the ground that provision was proposed to be made for these works in bill No. 89, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McKAY also made a report on the resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina, respecting the preservation of Sullivan's Island, recommending that the appropriation for that object in bill No. 89 be increased so as to conform it to the estimates.

Mr. McKAY also made an unfavorable report on the petition of Sherlock S. Gregory.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. MORGAN reported a bill for the relief of Henry Bush.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia reported a bill granting a pension to David W. Sleet, of the State of Virginia.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. PRATT reported a resolution to print 1000 extra copies of the report of this committee.

Mr. EVERETT moved its consideration at this time; but it was objected to, and the resolution, under the rule, lies over.

Mr. GARLAND moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit the following resolution, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, as soon as practicable, whether, in the present financial condition of the country and of the Treasury, it will not be most judicious and proper to make such appropriations as will preserve the public works from injury and dilapidation alone; and if such a course will not be judicious and proper, and then he inform the House whether some or all the estimates for the service of the year 1838 already submitted, for fortifications, the improvement of harbors and rivers, the establishment of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, the construction of roads, the service of the Indian Department, and for all other purposes, cannot be reduced without injury to the public service; and if such reduction can be made, that he designate what proposed appropriations may properly be reduced, and how much; and further, that he inform the House whether some of the appropriations already made may not, without material injury to the country, be suspended for the present; if so, to designate them; also, that he inform this House whether, if all the appropriations made are expended, and those proposed are made, the amount now in the Treasury, or estimated to come into it during the present year, will be sufficient to meet them; and, if not, what will be the deficit, and in what manner it is proposed to be met.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 94, nays 55, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Sundry bills from the Senate were then taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

COMMISSION OF CLAIMS.

The House then passed to the special order, and went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CORWIN in the Chair, on the bill reported by Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, "to establish a board of commissioners to examine and decide certain claims against the United States."

The bill was sustained by Messrs. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, HENRY, CRAIG, and UNDERWOOD, and opposed by Messrs. ADAMS and SERGEANT; when, without taking the question, the committee rose, had leave to sit again, and, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, the bill was made the special order for to-morrow.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
FRIDAY, April 6, 1838.

Mr. BENTON presented the petition of Israel Beeler, in relation to a mill seat in the public lands: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SEVIER presented the resolutions of the Legislature of Arkansas on the subject of the public lands: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of various petitions and memorials that had been referred to them.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the same committee, reported without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of Pelter and Albert of New Orleans.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Fischer, deceased, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MERRICK presented the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, asking further aid from Congress for the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, or if that cannot be granted, a surrender of the interest of the United States in said canal in consideration of the large advances made for it by the State: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Nathaniel Hamer, on the ground that a general law had been passed embracing his case.

Mr. YOUNG, on leave, introduced a bill granting a quantity of land to the Missouri and Rock River canal company; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill to amend the act for enrolling conveyances, quietting possessions, and securing real estate to purchasers in the District of Columbia, passed the first day of May, 1832.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Dashiell; and

The bill to extend the time for selling the lands granted to the Kentucky asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb. This bill was also read the third time, by general consent, and passed.

DUELLING IN THE DISTRICT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge to fight a duel in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof. The question being on the amendment of Mr. CLAYTON to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, punishing the offence by fine not exceeding $2,000, and by imprisonment in the common jail for a term not less than two years.

Mr. LINN observed that when he yesterday proposed passing the bill over, it was not with the intention of making any further remarks on the subject, but that he might have an opportunity of consulting with the gentleman who introduced the bill, and the Senator from Delaware, who offered the amendment, as to the propriety of introducing some provision which would enable the prosecutor under this act to obtain witnesses. He was of opinion that no punishment should be inflicted on the seconds and surgeons, and by this means witnesses might be procured. What would be considered as a challenge would be a question for the jury to settle, as it would be impossible to define it in the act. Gentlemen who intended to fight might evade the law in the easiest way in the world. They might send an invitation to take tea at some given spot, or make an appointment for any trivial and fictitious purpose, taking care that the true one should be understood. He thought it would be the most difficult thing in the world to get testimony.

Mr. CLAYTON said they could get rid of the difficulty by providing that the seconds, or any other persons aiding or assisting in the challenge, shall be competent witnesses, exempting them in such case from punishment.

Mr. HUBBARD inquired whether the amendment would now be in order.

Mr. LINN did not purpose to offer an amendment. He suggested it to the member who introduced the bill, and to the Senator from Delaware, who, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, seemed to have it peculiarly in his care. He proposed it to the latter, under the expectation that he would adopt it as part of his amendment.

Mr. HUBBARD expressed the hope that they would at once proceed to take the question on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware. If he understood the amendment, it was to make the offence punishable by fine and imprisonment in the common jail, which he opposed at some length, on the ground that it was too lenient, and behind the legislation of all the States who had noticed the subject at all. The State of Delaware, he said, from which the gentleman who proposed this amendment came, and all the New England States, together with several others, had made this offence felony, and punished it by imprisonment in the penitentiary; and it appeared to him that they should not, in legislating on this subject, fall below the legislation of the States.

Mr. LINN drew his conclusions directly different from the Senator from New Hampshire. If the gentleman would show him a case in any of the States where a man concerned in a duel had been pronounced a murderer, or sent to the penitentiary, then his remarks would apply. As he remarked the other day, he wanted to see a law passed that would produce some practical effects, not such a law that a jury could not be found to carry into execution. He had seen the effects of such laws in his own State. There the punishment for fighting a duel, where death ensued, was death, and yet men fought duels as if no law existed at all. But they had now a law in his State which was more effectual for the prevention of duelling than any law that had ever been passed. In cases as assault, all abusive words and defamatory language went to the jury in mitigation of the offence—

Mr. BENTON. As a justification.

Mr. LINN. Yes, sir, as a justification; and if that abusive member, the tongue, was permitted to have too free a license, the same license was permitted to the injured individual to redress his grievance. He thought if the same law was applied to the Senate of the United States, there would be little more decorum than he had sometimes witnessed. This law, of which he had spoken, had had a better effect in the prevention of duelling than any that had ever been passed, and he thought it would be better for the peace and harmony of society if such a law was more generally prevalent throughout the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD thought their legislation should be governed by the wisdom and propriety of the measure, leaving the execution of the laws to those who had them in charge.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose under a high sense of duty to his State, to take part in this debate. He did not propose detaining the Senate a moment longer than was necessary to enable him to submit, in a very brief manner, his views on the important and exciting subject before the Senate. Representing, in part, one of the great Western States, the opinions of whose citizens on this subject had never been expressed in this chamber, and firmly believing, as he did, that it was important to their character at home and abroad that they should be fairly represented in this matter, he should offer no apology for addressing the Senate a few moments. He concurred entirely with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. GRUNDY] in the impropriety of dragging into the debate the recent unfortunate affair between members of the other branch of Congress; and he regretted that a single Senator had thought proper to recur in debate to that lamentable conflict. A recurrence to that circumstance is calculated to produce excitement here, and unavoidably to disqualify the Senate to legislate with that calmness and deliberation in which all highly penal laws should be enacted. If you examine particular cases, this debate cannot be confined to the recent one: it will extend to many other similar ones that have occurred at different periods of our national existence. The time of the Senate will be occupied in worse than a mere unprofitable debate. Senators will become excited, and crimination and recrimination will follow, as it may be supposed to operate on public opinion for or against parties or individuals; while the great principles of the bill will be lost in the personal contests that may grow out of the debate. He deprecated such a course, and thanked the chairman of the committee for his timely admonition.

The recent unfortunate affair, he regretted to see, had been seized upon to feed the flames of party. It had been placed on party grounds, as if one party were duellists, and the other not. This was an unjust and unwise ground on which to place that or any other similar occurrence. On this subject there were two parties, but they were not the political parties that divide the people of this nation. He was bound, in truth, to admit the fact, however much he might feel disposed to throw the mantle of oblivion over that part of the past history of the country, that neither of the great political parties can say, we are all exempt from all participation in that mode of deciding personal difficulties, and yet all parties speaking were opposed to this barbarous custom. This was not a party question; it was a question of vastly higher consideration than the mere political matters of the day. It was a question of life or death; of morality and religion on the one side, and immorality and crime on the other. It was a duelling and anti-duelling question. These questions can never be circumscribed by party boundaries, nor controlled by party considerations; they rise paramount to all political restraints, and must stand or fall upon those immutable and everlasting principles which existed anterior to the formation of civil society.

Mr. S. would briefly notice the objections that had been raised by Senators to any action of this body on this subject. The Senate had been told that it was useless to legislate; that public opinion would not carry out their enactments; that the law would remain a dead letter on the statute book; that the freedom of debate would degenerate into licentious personal abuse; that it was necessary to hold in terrorem over members of Congress this code of honor, as it was termed, to restrain them in the exercise of their duties here; that the common law, that punishes the homicide with death, is sufficient for the protection of society; these, so far as he had heard, were the principal objections to the proposed measure; and, while he admitted that they had been urged with much zeal, he could not yield to the correctness of the principles, nor to the reasons by which they had been sustained. The position had been assumed, and maintained with much force, that public opinion would not bear Congress out in this measure. Mr. S. believed that the truth of the case was directly the reverse. Public opinion was, at that moment, at the doors of the Capitol, in a voice of thunder requesting, nay, more, demanding of Congress to arrest this bloody code, to stay this desolating and inhuman custom. Humanity and religion were suppliants in these halls; and shall Congress turn a deaf ear to these demands, these entreaties, these supplications? Public opinion opposed to action on this subject! Impossible! Where would Senators find such a state of public opinion? Would they find it in the Eastern, the Middle, or the Southern States? Senators say no! Where then? Did they look for it in the West, the great West? If so, they would search in vain for it there. He spoke with confidence of his own State, and had no doubt but that he spoke the language of the other Western States. He was aware that in early times nearly all of the assassinations, robberies, and murders of the world were located in the West, and prejudices had been excited against the Western people. Those prejudices, however, had always been removed by an acquaintance with that people; and it was due to them, amongst whom he had lived over twenty years, to say, that the world does not contain a more industrious, enterprising, moral, law abiding, and honorable people. He entirely concurred with the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that the West required of Congress to pursue an efficient course on this subject, and would not be satisfied without such action.

It has been argued that the act, if passed, would remain a dead letter on the statute book; that it would not be executed. He could not admit such to be the fact. He was unwilling to believe that the public mind was so vicious; that there was such a morbid state of public feeling that jurors and courts would disregard their oaths to acquit the guilty. But even if this were admitted to be the case, it was no argument against this measure in his mind. Shall the Senate refuse to do its duty, lest it shall place others in a situation to violate their duty? Mr. S. could not consent to falter in the discharge of what he believed to be his duty to himself, his country, and his God, because it had been suggested by honorable Senators that jurors would not convict, and the Executive would pardon where convictions should be had. He had resolved in his own mind to be governed by no such considerations. He would do his duty, and let the responsibility rest with those were charged with the execution of the laws. With them and the people be it. He would satisfy his own conscience, and represent what he believed to be the opinion of his State on this subject. Let others do the same, and the law will not only be passed, but he fully believed it would be executed should its provisions be violated.

The common law will still be left in full force. The bill does not contemplate interfering with the common law offence, or the common law punishment. It steers clear of the common law, and creates and punishes, with imprisonment in the penitentiary, the offence of challenging, accepting or carrying a challenge, or aiding, or abetting in it, or posting, or publishing any person who may have refused to accept a challenge or fight a duel. In a word, the bill punishes all the preliminary steps to the final duel. It meets the offender at the threshhold, and says to him, stop in your mad, in your unlawful, your unholy career. You are treading on ground covered with ignominy and penalties. You must surrender your code of honor, and submit to the laws of that society under which you enjoy all the blessings that surround you. Take not vengeance into your own hands. You shall not assail the life of a fellow-being. Nor shall you wantonly put your own life at hazard. All the States had laws similar to the bill before the Senate. The people had demanded these laws. The District of Columbia alone remained unprotected. And shall this District be left the only spot in the nation in which this work of destruction, this waste of human life, this violation of the laws of God and man, shall be tolerated and suffered to be carried on with impunity? It was already said that this was an asylum for all manner of wickedness and crime; that members of Congress, when here, were removed from those legal restraints under which they act in the States from which they came. Shall Congress give countenance to this statement, by refusing to come up to this mark, at least to the extent that the States have gone? He hoped not. It was here that much might be done to aid public opinion. He had little doubt but that the effect of the opinion of Congress on this subject will be greater on the public mind than even the penal enactments of the bill. Shall Congress not, then, set the example? shall its members not throw their influence into the scale of morality and religion, and do all in their power to arrest this bloody, this inhuman custom?

It has been contended that if we pass this law, the freedom of debate will degenerate into licentiousness and personal abuse; that if Senators and Representatives in Congress are not to be held personally responsible to the injured party for words spoken here of a personal character, the debates will become personal, vindictive, and insufferable. Mr. S. could not come to that conclusion. He thought the passage of the bill would have a salutary effect on the debates. He was, however, not willing, in the first place, to presume that any member of Congress would be willing to hazard his reputation so far as to violate that decorum which is due to himself and the body of which he is a member, in a manner to require personal satisfaction; and in the next place he thought it would be so obvious to every one that attempted such a course, that the aggressor would be the sufferer in the opinion of the body to which he belonged, that the unruly tongue would be sufficiently bridled without a resort to that misnamed code of honor under which the duellist seeks satisfaction for his real or supposed wrongs. No man of respectability would venture his reputation by attacking, with calumny, a member thus situated. But again: Was there no other way of meeting the tongue of the slanderer than by a resort to deadly weapons? Was there no other remedy but to take the life of the defamer, or suffer your own to be taken by him, to satisfy the bloody requirements of this fancied code? Surely there was: oppose truth to falsehood. decorum to indecorum, and public opinion will always prove a more salutary and efficient protection to the character of the assailed than all the duels in the world have ever done.

It had been suggested in debate, that members who vote for this bill may be charged with asking a protection for their persons and characters, which they have not the moral courage to defend. He thought there was nothing in this. The moral courage of members of Congress was not so much doubted as was their prudent forbearance to bring that courage to the test on trivial occasions. Few men lack courage: certainly more lack prudence. It had been wisely said, that true courage is not always found in rash adventures; nor does it follow that there is a defect of moral courage, where individuals refuse to recognise that sanguinary and inhuman custom, that dates its origin in the dark and barbarous ages, and which must, sooner or later, be entirely driven, by the force of morality, religion, law, and public opinion, from the shores of this enlightened nation, to hide its hideous face in the darker portions of the pagan world.

Senators who concur in the opinion that the custom of duelling was wholly indefensible, and ought to be arrested, still insisted that Congress cannot, by its action, effect a remedy. They contend that the common law, punishing the crime with death, cannot be enforced; that public opinion is against it. To this it may be answered that the public mind seems naturally to recoil from capital punishment; and all manner of excuses and doubts are thrown into the scale of the defendant on the trial, and every pretext is sought by the Executive to justify the exercise of his clemency. The exemption from punishment not unfrequently arises from the awful nature of the punishment inflicted. Humanity shudders at the punishment of death, and mercy, the darling attribute of Deity, exercises, in those cases where that punishment is inflicted, a powerful influence over the human mind. Admitting, then, all that has been stated as to the difficulty of enforcing the common law, it does not follow that Congress should not do all in its power to prevent the final catastrophe by punishing the preparatory acts; by providing a punishment proportioned to the enormity of the offence; by making the whole transaction infamous, from its incipient stages to the last act in the tragedy; by presenting a legal code, making that infamous which this false code of honor makes honorable. It is highly probable that cases would occur, in despite of all the laws there could be enacted. Such was the case with every other crime, and why should it not be so with this? There were moments in the lives of men, when, owing to some great exciting cause, they became alike reckless of human and divine laws, and rashly set both at defiance. But this admission is no argument against this bill that will not hold against all criminal laws with equal force. We are notified of the cases that do occur, and they make an impression on our minds, while the thousands that are prevented by our laws are unknown and unobserved.

In the case of duelling, Congress may not be able to prevent the commission of the offence in all cases. Desperate men, it is to be feared, will disregard all law, human and divine, and madly rush on to their own destruction. But it is the duty of Congress, within its constitutional powers, to throw every obstacle in the way of these deeds of desperation. If one victim can be saved; if one innocent family can be rescued; if a widow's tears and her orphans' cries can be turned into joy and blessings on your head, you will have received a high reward in the approbation of your own consciences.

After some remarks from Mr. PRESTON,

Mr. SEVIER said that although he was no friend to duelling, yet he disliked this bill from one end of it to the other. He believed it was a bill wholly for the protection of members of Congress, who, not satisfied with the protection afforded them by the Constitution, of exemption from arrest and from being sued for words used in debate, wanted the additional protection of this bill. A man is villified and abused in one of the Houses of Congress, and he, of course, will expect the offender to give him satisfaction in some way or other, and this bill says he shall not have it. What then will be the consequence? Why, something like the affair of Houston and Stansbury; the injured man will take the law into his own hands, chastise the traducer, and then he will be brought up to the bar of the House, from whence, after five or six weeks are unprofitably consumed in the examination, he will be dismissed with a reprimand. This bill was avowedly made to protect members of Congress, and to protect them from what? Why to protect them in abusing their masters—the people who sent them here. It amounted to this, and no more. Individuals coming to this city, or residing here, may go out and fight, and be killed too, and nothing is said of it; but let a member of Congress be killed in a duel, or be whipped in the streets, or kicked out of a boarding house, and the business of the nation must be set aside to legislate on it. If the object was solely to suppress duelling and not for the protection of the members, why not pass a law to prevent it in our other Territories as well as in the District of Columbia? Why not include Wisconsin and Florida, and our forts and arsenals? He thought this District was already sufficiently disfranchised, and he would not add any more to its disabilities. Members of Congress might talk of Tom, Dick, or Harry, as they pleased, and could not be sued for slander; and now they would take away from the injured individual the only remedy left him. I am opposed, continued Mr. S. to passing laws for our own protection, because if you pass one, the same reasons will operate in passing another; and the next time Mr. Stansberry, or Mr. any-body-else, is whipped by Houston, every member of Congress must have a corporal's guard to protect him in passing from his boarding house to the Capitol. Now he would ask if the people of the United States would be willing to be taxed for any such purpose, for it would take at least three thousand men to furnish a corporal's guard to each member, and they must therefore have an additional army, or leave the frontiers exposed. He was satisfied that more importance was attached to this subject than it deserved, and he believed out of one thousand duels, nine out of every ten of them were fought for causes that could not be got over any other way. He knew that duels were frequently fought for trivial causes, but he was convinced that it was otherwise in a vast majority of cases. He held himself responsible for every thing he said on that floor, and he would not give a vote to take away that responsibility. He did not by this, mean to say that he would fight every body or nobody; that he would think of when the occasion required; but this he did say, that he was not going to shield himself by his vote on this bill from the consequences that might be brought on him by his own language. After some further remarks from Mr. S.—

The question was taken on Mr. CLAYTON'S amendment, and it was lost—yeas 12, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Strange, Trotter, Walker, and White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, and Wright—20.

The question then recurring on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, which substitutes for the punishment of death, as in the bill, imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not less than ten, nor more than twenty, years.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to amend by making the imprisonment not less than five, nor more than twenty, years; which was agreed to.

Mr. NORVELL moved further to amend by striking out twenty years and inserting ten; which was also carried.

Mr. NILES moved further to amend the bill, by providing that the persons offending under this act shall be for ever incapable of holding any office or appointment under the authority of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL thought they had carried the matter far enough. They subjected the man guilty of duelling to a punishment of not less than five, nor more than ten, years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and now the gentleman wanted to add disqualification from office. Was it likely, he asked, that a man who shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary will ever be appointed to an office under the Government of the United States? It did appear to him that the additional penalty proposed would be rendering the bill somewhat ludicrous.

Mr. NILES spoke somewhat at length in defence of his amendment, contending that, as the punishment had been lessened by the amendment just passed, an additional penalty was necessary, and that the penalty he proposed would most probably be inflicted even if the other was not. Mr. N. could not agree with his friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] that this bill was for the protection of members of Congress only. It had a much higher object in view—that of suppressing an odious and criminal practice, and of securing the perfect independence of the representatives of the people. His friend from Arkansas seemed to be ambitious of martyrdom, and wanted to be shot at. Now, he would have no objection to introducing an amendment to exempt his friend from the operation of the bill, but he was anxious that it should pass for the benefit of those who had no wish, like him, to run against the muzzle of a gun.

Mr. N. made some further remarks in reply to Mr. PRESTON, and, after some remarks from the latter,

The question was taken on Mr. NILES's amendment, and it was lost—ayes 14, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Trotter, Walker Williams, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, and White—17.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana offered an amendment, making the surgeons witnesses, providing they shall not have advised the challenge, and exempting them from punishment.

Mr. NORVELL opposed the amendment, on the ground that it would prevent surgeons from being engaged at all—thus, breaking up a custom which humanity had originated.

After some remarks from Messrs. SMITH of Indiana and PRENTISS, the former withdrew his amendment, as he perceived that it would embarrass the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana then offered an amendment, authorizing magistrates when they have sufficient reason to believe that a duel is about to be fought, to issue their warrants to bring the parties before them, when they are further authorized to compel them to give bond and security to keep the peace for one year, and in default thereof, to commit them to jail.

Mr. CLAYTON opposed this amendment as contrary to one of the fundamental principles of law, and contrary also to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. This amendment, he contended, would put every man in the District in the power of any magistrate who might affect to believe that he was about to fight a duel.

After some remarks from Mr. SMITH of Indiana in support of the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. WHITE then moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting a substitute providing that every person who shall hereafter be appointed to office shall, in addition to the usual qualification, take an oath that he has not, since the passage of this act, been directly or indirectly concerned in a duel. Mr. W. addressed the Senate at some length in support of the amendment; after which,

Mr. PRENTISS asked for the yeas and nays on the question; which, having been ordered, resulted—yeas 13, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Trotter, Williams, Wright, and Young—19.

The question then coming up on concurring with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama asked that the question be taken on the third amendment separately. He was opposed to this amendment, because it went beyond the District of Columbia into the adjoining States.

The question was then taken on concurring with the third amendment; and it was lost—yeas 15, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Williams, Wright, and Young—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Trotter, Walker, and White —16.

The other amendments were then concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

And the Senate adjourned.

The bill, as it passed the Senate, is in the following words:

A BILL to prohibit the giving or accepting, within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person shall, in the District of Columbia, challenge another to fight a duel, or shall send or deliver any written or verbal message, purporting or intended to be such challenge, or shall accept any such challenge or message, or shall, knowingly, carry or deliver any such challenge or message, or shall, knowingly, carry or deliver an acceptance of such challenge or message to fight a duel in or out of the said District, and such duel shall be fought in or out of the said District, and either of the parties thereto shall be slain, or mortally wounded in such duel, the surviving party to such duel, and every person carrying or delivering such challenge or message, or acceptance of such challenge or message as aforesaid, and all others aiding or abetting therein, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and upon conviction thereof, in any court competent to the trial thereof in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall give or send, or cause to be given or sent, to any person in the District of Columbia, any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or if any person in said District shall accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall be the bearer of any such challenge, every person so giving or sending, or causing to be given or sent, or accepting such challenge, or being the bearer thereof, and every person aiding or abetting in the giving, sending, or accepting such challenge, shall be deemed guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in any court competent to try the same in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall assault, strike, beat, or wound, or cause to be assaulted, stricken, beaten, or wounded, any person in the District of Columbia, for declining or refusing to accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall post or publish, or cause to be posted or published, any writing charging any such person, so declining or refusing to accept any such challenge, to be a coward, or using any other opprobious or injurious language therein, tending to degrade and disgrace such person for so declining or refusing such challenge, every person so offending, on conviction thereof in any court competent to the trial thereof, in the said District, shall be punished by confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the oath now prescribed by law to be administered to the grand jury in the District of Columbia, they shall be sworn faithfully and impartially to inquire into, and true presentment make of, all offences against this act.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SATURDAY, April 7, 1838.

Mr RHETT of South Carolina was announced as having been appointed by the Speaker to fill the vacancy on the Committee of Ways and Means occasioned by the death of Mr. MCKIM.

Mr. HENRY asked leave to present some petitions on the subject of the late duel.

Mr. GRANT also rose for the same purpose.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio said he was compelled to object, because it would arrest the progress of the special order.

The resolution reported yesterday by Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to print 1,000 extra copies of the report of that committee, being the first business in order, was taken up.

Mr. SIBLEY moved 3,000 copies, which was rejected without a division; and after some brief remarks from Messrs. EVERETT, HAYNES, PRATT, and PETRIKEN,

Mr. EVERETT moved to add also the letter of the architect of the public buildings: lost.

The resolution was then rejected, ayes 61, noes 66.

Mr. HAMER then rose and stated that he had a resolution which he did not wish to offer at that time, but to ask the consent of the House to have it printed, and give notice that, on Monday next, he should call it up and move its adoption.

Considering that the business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition; and, considering, also, that a part of the Bank of the United States have expressed a desire to resume specie payments at an early period,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, if the banks, or a portion of them, do thus resume, it will be the duty of the General Government, within the limits of its constitutional authority, to aid such banks, as the present Administration designs to do, in regaining public confidence, and to sustain them in their laudable efforts to fulfil their obligations, to relieve the wants of the community, and to restore to the people a sound circulating medium.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported Senate bill, with an amendment, to establish a criminal court for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Susannah Hoagland, of New York.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported Senate bill, without amendment, to revive and continue in force the act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds received during the war of the Revolution.

Mr. T. also reported a bill granting a pension to Harvey Reynolds.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit the following resolution, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, as soon as practicable, whether, in the present financial condition of the country and of the Treasury, it will not be most judicious and proper to make such appropriations as will preserve the public works from injury and dilapidation alone; and if such a course will not be judicious and proper, he then inform the House whether some or all the estimates for the service of the year 1838 already submitted, for fortifications, the improvement of harbors and rivers, the establishment of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, the construction of roads, the service of the Indian Department, and for all other purposes, cannot be reduced without injury to the public service; and if such reduction can be made, that he designate what proposed appropriations may properly be reduced, and how much; and further, that he inform the House whether some of the appropriations already made may not, without material injury to the country, be suspended for the present; if so, to designate them; also, that he inform this House whether, if all the appropriations made are expended, and those proposed are made, the amount now in the Treasury, or estimated to come into it during the present year, will be sufficient to meet them; and, if not, what will be the deficit, and in what manner it is proposed to be met.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 76, nays 60, requiring a majority of two-thirds.

DIVORCE OF GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted some since by Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed also to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the Government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. BOND resumed his remarks in support of the resolution, and continued till the expiration of the hour.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting information on the subject of the sale of the United States lead mines; which, on motion of Mr. McKAY, was laid on the table.

COMMISSION OF CLAIMS.

The House then again went into committee, Mr. CORWIN in the Chair, on the "bill to establish a board of Commissioners to examine and decide certain claims against the United States."

The question was on the amendment of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio (who had reported the bill) to appoint the Commissioners during good behavior, with a limitation to the age of 65 years; and the question pending was on the following amendment to Mr. WHITTLESEY'S, moved by Mr. HENRY:

"And to serve for three years, one for six years, and one for nine years; and at the termination of these respective periods, and every nine years thereafter, a new appointment of one commissioner shall be made as aforesaid, to serve for nine years."

On moving this amendment, yesterday,

Mr. HENRY said he was satisfied with the general principles of the bill now before the committee, on the ground of economy on the part of the Government, as well as an act of justice to private claimants. He believed there must be few members in this House but are now convinced that it was impossible for Congress to act upon the private claims presented within a reasonable time, and requiring its attention. He knew there were claims standing as far back as twenty years; and one of an older date than that, from the district he had the honor to represent, had passed this session. But whilst he approbated the general features of the bill, he must beg leave to submit the amendment which he sent to the CHAIR as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, to be inserted at the end of the sixth line in the first section.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied, and spoke in favor of an independent board.

Mr. ADAMS propounded questions to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the constitutionality of limiting such appointments.

Mr. HENRY, in answer to Mr. ADAMS, said he did not apprehend there was the constitutional difficulty suggested by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; that this contemplated board of commissioners would not be a court, such as was recognised in the clause of the Constitution adverted to by that honorable gentleman; that this, he thought, could not be called a court, although, it is true, it would be clothed with judicial powers; but so were all auditors who adjudicate and settle accounts. He could, however, view this board in no other light than that of auditors or commissioners to pass upon accounts or claims, and could not view it as a judicial tribunal within the meaning of the Constitution.

As to the objections, Mr. H. said, made by his friend from Ohio against his substitute, and in favor of an independent permanent board, he was constrained to say he was opposed to life tenure of office, or office during good behavior. This principle of independence often made officers too independent, and they become careless and inattentive; and as to the expression of the term of good behavior, it might almost as well be said during bad behavior. No matter, scarcely, how improperly an officer acts, it is very difficult to remove him by impeachment; there are few that like to enlist in a prosecution of this kind; it is a very unpleasant task. Mr. H. said, from his experience he was led to believe, although there might be some change or fluctuation arising from party by short or limited periods in office, it was still, in his opinion, a safer mode than that of life tenure.

It was true, the commissioner appointed for three years, under the provisions of his substitute, might not by that time have had experience enough to become a very expert officer, and might, it was certain, be turned out. But he was re-eligible, and if a good and faithful officer it was not very likely that would be the case. The principle he advocated, was that of rotation in office. It was an old Republican principle, and he hoped his amendment would prevail.

Mr. BELL spoke for some time, and advocated the bill as a matter of experiment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, opposed the bill on the ground that Congress had no power to constitute such a board, and the claims could not be paid without a special act of legislation severally therefor.

Mr. MASON of Ohio supported the bill, chiefly in response to the constitutional objections to it, or want of power in Congress to pass such a bill.

Mr. TILLINGHAST briefly opposed it.

Mr. GRAY of New York supported it at some length, when, on motion of Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina, the committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, the bill was made the special order for Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Hon. JOHN M. PATTON, resigning his seat in Congress on account of his appointment to a State office, and the expressed desire of the Legislature that he should do so; which was laid on the table.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 9, 1838.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. HAMER rose, and stated that he wished to avail himself of the earliest opportunity of making an explanation in reference to the resolution laid on the table by him on Saturday.

The resolution was as follows:

"Considering that the business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition: and

"Considering, also, that a part of the banks of the United States have expressed a desire to resume specie payments at an early period:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if the banks, or a portion of them, do thus resume, it will be the duty of the General Government, within the limits of its constitutional authority, to aid such banks, as the present Administration design to do, in regaining public confidence, and to sustain them in their laudable efforts to fulfil their obligations, to relieve the wants of the community, and to restore to the public a sound circulating medium."

It seemed that the introduction of the resolution produced some excitement in the House, and a number of gentlemen came to him to inquire the meaning, the true construction, &c. and among the rest a friend, in whose judgment he had great confidence, suggested to him, that if the resolution went out in the newspapers, without any explanatory remarks from Mr. H. it might be subject to the inference that he thought the present Administration really entertained hostility towards these banks, who were about to resume specie payments, and that his object, in offering the resolution, was to compel them to change their course. Mr. H. replied, at once, that he entertained no such sentiment, and that, when he got an opportunity to explain, he would show what his meaning was. However, to avoid any such construction or conclusion, and knowing that the resolution did not go on the journals, not being in the possession of the House, and entirely his own, he considered he had a right to modify it, either before or after its being printed, and he accordingly inserterted the words, "as the present Administration design to do," as explanatory of what was his own opinion. He did not suppose, at that time, that he was exercising a right that did not belong to him; yet, if he had done wrong in making that modification, he certainly asked pardon of the House. The resolution, without those words, was the resolution he intended to offer, and he should, in submitting it, strike out that modification, as it was merely inserted temporarily in self-defence, and in explanation of his motives. Mr. H. then asked the consent of the House to submit it at this time in that form.

Mr. PETRIKEN objected.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio hoped his colleague would not press it at this time, as he would have an opportunity to do so before the day was over.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman would move a suspension of the rules. Mr. W. had voted to print the resolution, though he would not have supported it with the modification, but had no doubt the gentleman had a perfect right to make it.

Mr. HAMER moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. PENNYBACKER asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN, a call of the House was assented to, and proceeded in until one hundred and fifty-six members had answered to their names, when, on motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was further dispensed with.

Mr. CAMBRELENG inquired of the CHAIR whether the words "as the present Administration design to do" had been stricken from the resolution by the mover?

The CHAIR replied that the gentleman had so modified it, but it was not yet before the House.

Mr. PICKENS was understood to remark that he could perceive no practicable benefit whatever to result from the adoption of this resolution.

The rules were not suspended—yeas 110, nays 61.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then asked leave to lay on the table, and have printed, some amendments he would submit to the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, when it should be taken up for consideration.

Mr. PETRIKEN objected.

The amendments of Mr. UNDERWOOD were as follows:

And for the purpose of affording such banks as ought to be assisted, that aid within the constitutional authority of the General Government—

Be it further resolved, That it shall be the duty of the collecting officers of the Government to receive in payment of all sums due, whether for lands, duties, or foreign merchandise, or any other account whatever, the notes of any specie-paying bank incorporated by any State in the Union, whose capital actually paid in shall not be less than two millions of dollars, and whose notes in circulation do not exceed more than double the amount of specie owned and held by the bank in its vaults.

Resolved further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to instruct the collecting and receiving officers of the Government, from time to time, what bank notes are receivable under the preceding resolution, and the collecting and receiving officers shall act in pursuance of such resolutions.

Resolved, That if any bank fail or refuse to report its condition to the Secretary of the Treasury, monthly, or at any time the Secretary shall require; or if it shall appear that the directory of any bank shall, for more than a month at any one time, permit the notes in circulation to exceed more than double the amount of specie, without adopting prompt and efficient measures to restore that ratio by withdrawing the excess of notes from circulation, it shall be the duty of the Secretary to instruct the collecting and receiving officers thereafter to refuse the notes of such banks when offered in payment.

Resolved further, That it shall be lawful for the collecting and receiving officers of the Government to receive in payment the notes of such specie-paying banks whose capitals actually paid in do not amount to two millians of dollars, as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may direct them to receive; Provided, however, That the Secretary shall not authorize the receipt of the notes of any such bank, unless its specie shall be kept up to half the amount of its notes in circulation, and unless its officers report the condition of the bank to the Secretary, as is herein before required.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the public money to be deposited for safe-keeping in such State banks as shall pay specie for their notes, and which shall keep up the proportion of specie to the circulation herein before prescribed; and that the regulation shall continue until Congress, in pursuance of its constitutional duty, and the will of the nation, create a National Bank, to act as the fiscal agent of the Government.

Mr. MORRIS of Ohio submitted the following, which after some remarks in objection to its adoption at this time by Mr. LEGARE, was agreed to.

Whereas, the statement of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the military establishment for the year 1837, submitted to the House by W. B. Lewis, Second Auditor, in the Treasury Department, contains an item of eight hundred dollars allowed to Samuel Lewis, by the Secretary of War, for the services of his son Edward, (a minor,) as a clerk in the Pension Bureau, War Department, from July, 1818, to July, 1819, which said services were rendered more than nineteen years since.

And whereas the said Samuel Lewis has repeatedly presented said claim to both Houses of Congress, and it has always been rejected; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Expenditures of the War Department be instructed to inquire into, and report to this House, the facts connected with the case, and why said claim was paid after having been repeatedly rejected by both Houses of Congress.

STATE REVENUE.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, the following resolution, submitted by him on the 19th of March, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with a statement of the amount of revenue received in each State or Territory during the year 1836; and also the amount, as nearly as the same can be ascertained, expended during that year in each State or Territory; and also with a statement of the whole bank capital of the United States, designating the capital of each bank, and the place where located.

Mr. T. modified it by striking therefrom the call in relation to the banking capital; and, so modified, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to John H. Lynch

DIVORCE OF GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted some time since by Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed also to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the Government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. BOND continued his remarks till they were arrested by the orders of the day.

Sundry bills from the Senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to appropriate standing committees.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the naval service, for the year 1838."

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to make the sum for the South Sea Exploring Expedition a specific one.

Mr. MONTGOMERY hoped the bill would be recommitted, and that the amount for the Exploring Expedition would, at least, be specified, and then he should be prepared to vote upon it, and to vote against it. If any Exploring Expedition was wanted, let it be for exploring our own coast. If this motion should fail, Mr. M. should then renew the motion, with instructions to strike from the bill so much as embraced that object.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it was not necessary to recommit the bill to attain the object sought after, because the gentlemen might move at once to reduce it. But, whether the Exploring Expedition was continued, or a coasting squadron ordered, the same appropriation must be made, as the officers and men were all mustered and equipped for service. With reference to the propriety of the expedition, Mr. C. had been misunderstood in being represented as opposing it, for he had expressed no such opinion. What he had said was, that he was opposed to it upon so large a scale, and he had so stated when the appropriation was first made.

Mr. WISE was also of opinion that it was not necessary to recommit the bill; but he was in favor of an inquiry into the expediency of diverting the appropriation for the "exploded" expedition, for that was its true designation, to a better object.

Mr. ADAMS earnestly advocated the continuance of the expedition, and expressed his entire confidence in the science, skill, and experience of Lieut. Wilkes to conduct it to its completion with honor to the country.

Mr. MALLORY deprecated a discussion upon the Exploring Expedition on this bill, when the service was severely suffering for the want of its passage. He preferred that subject being discussed under a distinct proposition, when he would be prepared to prove that, according to the present plan, it could never be successful, especially that of appointing an inferior officer to the command.

Mr. INGHAM remarked that there could be no necessity for recommitting the bill to ascertain the specific sum required for the Exploring Expedition, since the estimates were all before the House. He then went into a review of the causes which had led to the delay of the expedition, in vindication of the course of the Secretary of the Navy, and replied to some other charges brought by Mr. MALLORY.

The discussion was further continued by Messrs. MALLORY, WISE, CAMBRELENG, INGHAM, HOFFMAN, and MERCER, when Mr. BRONSON obtained the floor; and, on his motion,

The House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Senate of the 26th March last, directing them to inquire into the expediency of refunding to those who have deposited in the Treasury of the United States money for the purpose of purchasing public lands the sums deposited by them.

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the payment of Richard Robertson, of Madison county, Alabama, of the value of a horse lost in the service of the United States during the Creek war of 1813 and 1814.

On motion of Mr. TROTTER,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from the town of Hernando, in the State of Mississippi, by way of Cartleville, Oakhill, and Chulahoma, to the town of Wyatt, in said State.

The bill to prohibit the giving or accepting a challenge in the District of Columbia to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

This bill having had its third reading—

Mr. CLAY said he had taken no part in the discussion which had been going on in relation to this matter, not however from any indisposition on his part to do all that he could to aid in the very laudable objects contemplated by the bill. No man would be happier than himself to see the whole barbarous system forever eradicated. It was well known, that in certain quarters of this country, public opinion was averse to duelling, and no man could fly in the face of that public opinion, without having his reputation sacrificed; while there were other portions again which exacted obedience to the fatal custom. The man with a high sense of honor, and nice sensibility, when the question is whether he shall fight or have the finger of scorn pointed at him, is unable to resist, and few, very few, are found willing to adopt such an alternative. When public opinion was renovated, and chastened by reason, religion and humanity, the practice of duelling would at once be discountenanced. It was the office of legislation to do all it could to bring about this healthful state of the public mind, and although it might not altogether effect so desirable a result, yet he had no doubt it would do much towards it, and with those views, he would give his vote for the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD asked for the yeas and nays on the passage; which were ordered, when there appeared for the bill 34, against it 1, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Sevier—1.

The following bills also were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill to amend the act entitled an act for quieting possessions, enrolling conveyances, and securing the estates of purchasers in the District of Columbia.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Dashiell.

GRADUATION OF THE PRICE OF PUBLIC LANDS.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands; the question being on the substitute proposed by the Committee on Public Lands; when

Mr. GRUNDY submitted the following amendment to the amendment, as a substitute for the original bill:

That from and after the thirtieth day of September, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-eight all the public lands of the United States which remain unsold, after having been offered at private sale at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, for five years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre; and all lands which shall have been so offered for ten years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre for twelve months after the said thirtieth day of September, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and after that time the same shall be subject to entry at the price of seventy-five cents per acre; and all lands which shall have been so offered for fifteen years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre for the space of twelve months, and after that time the same shall be subject to entry at seventy-five cents per acre for the space of twelve months, and after that time the same shall be subject to entry at fifty cents per acre.

Mr. GRUNDY said, in offering this amendment now, he was not actuated by any desire to discuss the general principles of the bill, but merely to show that the proposition offered by him was better calculated to subserve the interests of the United States in this matter than the original proposition of the committee. Mr. G. then went into a full explanation of the relative merits of the several propositions, contending that time was the only fair and legitimate mode of ascertaining the actual value of the public lands. His own experience had convinced him that nothing was more deceptive than the field notes of surveyors, which, from their mode of running the lines, and the nature of the country, must frequently give false impressions with regard to the value of lands. Another reason for preferring his amendment was, that while surveyors were as honest as common men, they were not more so, and might become interested in fixing upon the good lands, and make such representations in their notes as would subserve their own interests. Time was the true and only test of value. If the lands remained unsold for any number of years, it was prima facie evidence of the inferiority of their quality. The object of the Government, Mr. G. presumed, was not to retain any of the public domain; and when the best lands had been sold at the highest prices, it was alike consonant with justice and sound policy that the prices of inferior lands should be reduced, or the price so graduated, as, while it preserved the interests of the United States, would enable the poor to possess themselves of farms at a reduced price. Mr. G. also spoke of the expense that would be incident to a survey of these lands; and, on the whole, thought that the amendment would secure all the objects which the friends of the bill had in view.

Mr. WALKER did not consider it very important whether the amendment was adopted or not; nevertheless as this principle of valuation to which the gentleman objected had been recommended by the committee, he wished to explain the grounds on which they acted, and to correct some misapprehensions which seemed to exist on the subject. The appraisement was to be made by the Register and Receiver, aided by the Surveyor General, and by the field notes, sworn to by the deputy surveyor, and the two chain carriers—three individuals who have no interest in committing perjury. The Senator from Tennessee supposed that as the lines of the sections were only run on the exterior, that this criterion would prove deceptive; but this was the very case in which the Register and Receiver would direct an inspection. He thought, however, that the field notes were, in a vast number of cases, the best criterion to judge by. There were not only entire townships, but entire counties in which, in addition to the exterior section lines, 144 parallel lines were run, thus taking every part of the section. He would appeal to the Senator from Tennessee whether he would not rely on such field notes, sworn to by the deputy surveyor and the chain carriers, where it was shown that in all these lines there was nothing but pine barrens and fourth rate lands. In Mississippi and Alabama the Senator would find that entire counties and districts were thus returned. In nine cases out of ten the field notes would be the correct criterion to judge by. As regarded the expense, he thought the objection not a sound one. In such districts as he had referred to, the Register and Receiver referring only to the field notes, no expense would be involved. But where the district varied in value, and where the field notes afforded no criterion, then they would resort to inspection. Besides, it only cost four dollars a mile to survey, and the inspection could not come to any thing like that. He ventured to assert that the expense of inspection would not be one-eighth of one per cent. per mile.

Mr. GRUNDY was not satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Mississippi, and maintained, that if a satisfactory survey were made the cost would be much greater than was represented. Mr. G. contended, that in many sections field notes were deceptive, and instanced Arkansas and others, where the true value could only be ascertained from consultation with persons residing at or near the premises. The only question to be decided was, whether the Senator would take the proposition offered by the committee, or the amendment, offered by himself, which he thought he had shown to be liable to less objection.

Mr. SEVIER greatly preferred the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to that of the committee, on account of its simplicity and economy, as well as greater certainty of obtaining a correct valuation. He had no doubt but the lines run by the surveyors, and their field notes, were correct as far as they went; but, to his knowledge, they were frequently deceptive, and not to be relied on. The surveyor, in running his lines, could only note the quality of the land he saw; and on running through a canebrake, the land over which he passed might be worthless, while twenty yards to his right or left, where he could not see, the soil might be of the best quality. He had seen land described in these field notes as of great value, which was of the worst quality; while, on the other hand, he had known the very best lands to be set down as worthless. Mr. Mr. S. objected to the plan of personal inspection proposed by the committee, as leading to a great and useless expense. This inspection, he said, was to be made by the United States land officers, who, by being paid by the day—say from five to eight dollars, which was the general compensation for similar services—would find it their interest to be continually inspecting land when not engaged in the business of their respective offices. Mr. S. referred also to the great expense which would necessarily be incurred, of cutting roads through whole sections of canebrakes. Mr. S. greatly preferred the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, but said that he would vote for the bill with the other amendment, if he could not get the former.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama remarked, that having had, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, something to do with bringing in this amendment, he wished to set the Senator from Tennessee and others right with regard to it. The Senator treated the amendment of the committee as if it contained nothing as to the determination of the value of the lands but the field notes of the surveyors. Now, if the Senator had read the bill attentively, he would have found that the field notes were regarded as one of the criteria only; and that the value of the land as to its location, together with the time that it had been in the market, were also looked to. He was fully convinced that there was no certain way of ascertaining the precise value of the land, but by actual inspection; but to ascertain it in that way would be so expensive that every member of the Senate would be opposed to it. In casting about for other means of coming at this value, consistent with economy and convenience, the committee adopted the three considerations of the locality of the tract, the time it had been in the market, and the opinion of the land officers, founded upon the field notes, and their own inspection when necessary. He could not agree with the Senator from Arkansas, that the field notes were so little to be relied upon. It was not to be presumed that the surveyor, in running his lines, could not see sufficiently to the right and left to form a probably correct judgment as to the quality of the section. He runs the exterior lines of the section, and is required by law to put down a half mile stake. It was true that the character of the soil and the timber often changed within half a mile; but this seldom occurred where the surveyor did not observe it. But the locality of the tract was an important principle for ascertaining its value. The proximity to a navigable stream, or to a town, would render land more valuable than that of the same quality, as to soil, which was not so advantageously situated. But the Senator would observe, that with all these considerations, no land could be reduced in price until it had been offered first four years at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Secondly, it must be offered four years at one dollar per acre, before it could be reduced to seventy-five cents, and so on; always giving a sufficient time to sell, if worth the price. He agreed that the taking the time the lands had been in the market as the mode of valuing them, something like the plan of the Senator from Tennessee, would, under all the circumstances, be more likely to do justice to the Government; but, like his friend from Arkansas, he was willing to take either plan that a majority of the Senate preferred.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky had an utter aversion to reducing the price of the public land, which is already low enough, or interfering with a system which had worked well for so long a period. It could easily be shown that the contemplated reduction ought not to be made, and that all the tests of value were merely fallacious. This was all he would say at the present, indisposed as he was. The question might be taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, but he gave notice that he would, at another time, express his views at large upon that interesting topic, and should oppose both amendment and original bill.

Mr. GRUNDY said the Senator from Kentucky was averse to the whole system of graduation, and would oppose it any how, so that taking the question on the adoption of the amendment, was a matter of little consequence, so far as he was concerned. He [Mr. G.] was for reducing the price of the public lands, and would prefer the question on his amendment to be taken, and, whether it should be adopted or lost, the Senator would still have an opportunity of giving his views to the Senate.

The question was then taken on Mr. GRUNDY's amendment, and it was agreed to, and it being, by general consent, considered as the original text,

Mr. NILES moved an amendment, to extend the time from five to eight years for the reduction of the price to one dollar per acre, and from ten to twelve years for the reduction to seventy-five cents per acre, and to strike out that part of the bill which reduced the land to fifty cents per acre.

Mr. N. said he did not intend to go into a general discussion of the bill, or the graduating principle. By adopting the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] we have decided that the true test for a reduction of the price of the public land is the time it has been in market. This he considered correct, although he was sensible that a valuation might, in some cases, afford an additional security; but he thought a valuation and classification of the public lands would be attended with considerable expense, and amount to but little, as respects the object in view. The time the lands have been in market he regarded as the most safe test, as it depended on the vigilance of individuals, whose sagacity, brought into action by private interest, would hardly fail of causing the public lands to be purchased or entered, in the order of time, according with their quality. The time that lands have been in market being adopted as the only test to determine what lands are of such inferior quality that the price ought to be reduced, the question is how long a period ought to be considered as sufficient to establish the fact. The bill proposed four years, and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee five years. He thought this term too short. The quantity of land offered for sale is very great, something like one hundred and thirty or forty millions of acres. Where so large a quantity of land is in market, it cannot all be taken up immediately. That only which is believed to be worth more than the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, will be entered on speculation. If there is more land in market of the real value of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre than is wanted for settlement, and which is not of sufficient additional value to be an object for speculation, it must, of course, remain, for a time, unsold. And the fact of its not being entered, cannot be regarded as an evidence that it is of less value than the minimum price. It will only prove that there are other lands in market of greater value, or which, from their situation, are more desirable. Our legislation must depend on general principles: it cannot be supposed that Congress can so adjust the price of the public lands, with reference to quality and location, as to produce a perfect equality, or to cause the sale of the public lands to be made with equal rapidity in all the districts.

That lands should have been in market five years and not taken up, would, no doubt, be evidence that other lands were in market of better quality, or preferable location; but it would not prove that such lands were inferior and worth less than the minimum price.

Time being the only evidence relied on to establish the inferiority of the lands, he thought such period should be required, as to settle the question beyond all doubt.

What, sir, are the grounds on which the graduating principle rests? It is not that it will operate beneficially to the United States, that it will aid the Treasury; but it is supported on the ground, of its being just towards the States where the lands are situated, and towards individual settlers who may have purchased adjoining lands. It is said to be unjust to hold the public lands all at the same price, when it must be apparent that they are of great difference in quality. This argument seems to assume that one dollar and twenty-five cents is the maximum price, and that the difference in quality must be adjusted, by reducing the price on the inferior qualities. But in point of fact, the entry price is the minimum price, or the average or medium price. But it is claimed that it is unjust to hold the public lands at such price as that they will not sell; that the settlement of the new States is thereby retarded, and their resources for taxation impaired, and individual settlers injured. He admitted that there was great force in these reasons, and was by no means opposed to the principle of graduation, and only wished to be cautious in its application, and to be careful that, under the appearance of graduating the price of the public lands, we do not necessarily disturb the land system, and pass a law for the reduction of the price of the public lands.

He would notice one other objection to the bill as it is: if so short a time as five years is established for the reduction of the price of the public lands, will it not induce purchasers to forbear to enter lands, until after this period has expired, so as to get them at the reduced price? Some sections, highly valuable, some choice spots would no doubt be entered; but the rest might be suffered to remain until it could be obtained at the reduced price. It appeared to him that this would be the probable result. So that, instead of promoting the sale of the public lands, your graduating principle would delay their sale, as well as diminish the proceeds. He wished to disturb the present system as little as possible, and did not think the price ought to be reduced, until the lands had been in market such a length of time, as should establish the fact beyond all reasonable doubt, that the lands were of inferior quality, and would not sell at the present minimum price; and eight years he did not think too long for that purpose.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped that neither himself, nor those associated with him, would be accused of arrogance when they claimed to know more with regard to the public domain, and all the circumstances connected with it, than those who never had been upon it. The honorable Senator from Connecticut was not aware of the situation of these lands when they were first brought into market. He would give an illustration from his own personal knowledge. In the county of Jackson, Alabama, the lands were brought into market eight years ago; and there were then two thousand voters in the county, or fifteen hundred families. Many of these individuals took pre-emption rights, many bought at the public auction which was held, after which the lands were open to every body at $1 25 per acre. Now, he would ask the gentleman if it was not fair to presume that, after the lands had been culled by these pre-emptions and auction sales, the remainder were not worth less than the Government price. The gentleman must acknowledge that these auction sales and pre-emptions furnished sufficient security that the Government could make no sacrifice in reducing the price, as the bill now proposed. What was the case with regard to lands not surveyed? There were three counties in his State which might be regarded as new, and they contained a population of not less than five hundred families each. This was the territory lately acquired by treaty from the Cherokee Indians. Now, was it reasonable to suppose that, in a district thus picked and culled by the settlers, and then at auction, and afterwards subject to entry four years, the lands could not be reduced twenty-five cents per acre without injury to the Government? His friends from Indiana, Arkansas, and Missouri, who represented new States, and knew the face of the country, and the manner in which it was settled, could tell the gentleman that no sales took place until settlement, and that population always preceded the surveys, as it would be impossible, without a military force, to keep the settlers from the fresh lands. It never had been done, and was not likely to be done now. As to the idea held out by the Senator from Connecticut that an individual who wished to purchase would postpone it for five years for the sake of getting land at the reduced price, it had no foundation in reality. Would any prudent man risk the loss of a tract which he wished to purchase by letting it remain open for five years, to be bought by any body, for the sake of saving twenty-five cents an acre? He thought not, and he put it to the honorable Senator if he thought a tract was worth one dollar and a quarter per acre, and wanted it, if he would risk the loss of it, by permitting it to remain open, subject to entry by any body and every body, for five years. He hoped the Senator would see the propriety of withdrawing his amendment, and if he did not do so, then he hoped that the Senate would disagree with him and reject it.

Mr. BENTON wished, when the vote was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, to have the question divided. He thought the period of five years, as now in the bill, very ample, and one that allowed a very good opportunity of having all the lands picked and culled over, and the best taken out. They had to recollect that these lands had first been offered at public auction, where they would not bring the $1 25 per acre, and that they had remained open to every body at that price ever since. It was known that during the last two years fifty millions of acres had been sold, and that the spirit of speculation prevailing during that time had made very heavy drafts on the public domain. Lands had been taken up by agents for persons at a distance that were not worth twelve and a half cents per acre. It was seen, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that there were, in round numbers, seventy millions of acres that had been subject to private entry for five years, and could not find purchasers at the established price. Out of that seventy millions, a considerable portion, if they believed the report of the land officers, was not worth having; but that of the remainder, a great deal of it would be sold immediately, if it was offered at its real value; for it was in the midst of the settlements, mixed up with the farms of the settlers, who would be glad to have it, some for the sake of the timber, some for the water, and some for the sake of extending their farms, and keeping off a bad neighbor. The great object at present was the state of the Treasury, and it was, therefore, desirable that these lands should be sold immediately, and the money brought into it.

Mr. WALKER thought five and ten years a sufficient criterion, but if the Senate thought it best to extend the time, he would prefer five and fifteen years to eight and twelve. He suggested to the Senator from Connecticut whether he would not be willing to modify his amendment to that effect.

Mr. NILES was unwilling to change his amendment, believing that the extension of the time for the first class of reductions, from five to eight years, to be the most important.

Mr. SEVIER hoped that his friend from Connecticut, who had stood by the squatters in many a hard-fought battle, would not desert them now. In the first place, this Government was the only one on earth that ever undertook to make money by selling land. On one side of us, Texas gives her lands to the settlers who will go on them; and, on the other side, in Canada, her Majesty, Queen Victoria, gives them farms on the same easy conditions. At this very time, there were thousands of our industrious and valuable citizens, who were induced to cross the river and go into Texas, because they could get land there for nothing, while our Government would not sell it for what it was worth. He had just received the information that two of the counties of his State wanted to give themselves to Texas; and, indeed, he did not know but at this moment his State was engaged in a war with General Houston, and all because the people could get lands on better terms from the Texan Government than ours. But what he more particularly objected to, was the injustice with which the new States were treated by holding the lands up at more than they were worth, and keeping them from settlement. If the lands were offered at a fair price, they would be sold, and be subject to taxation by the State, and thus enable her to support the expenses of her Government. He asked if it was fair for this Government, in this manner, to violate the compact with the new States. He regretted much that his State had ever relinquished the power of taxing the Government land; and, for his part, he would rather have remained out of the Union a few years longer than consent to it. If the State could tax the Government lands, he ventured to assert that they would not long be kept out of market, for they had there a very effectual mode of dealing with speculators when they got them subject to taxation. Give us, said Mr. S. the taxing power over these lands, and you may then keep them up as high as you please. He hoped that his friend from Connecticut, who had stood by him so long, would come to some compromise, and modify his amendment.

Mr. NILES replied, that after the very feeling appeals of his friend from Arkansas, and taking into consideration also his magnanimous course the other day on the duelling bill, when he was so willing to suffer martyrdom on that floor, he could not refuse to make some concessions to him in the way of a compromise; and he would therefore be willing to give him one year, and make his amendment read seven instead of eight years.

The question was then taken on striking out the word five, and inserting seven, and lost—ayes 17, noes 19.

The question was next taken on striking out ten and inserting twelve, and lost without a division; and

The question was then taken on striking out all after the word acre, as in the tenth line, which was also lost—ayes 15, noes 19.

The effect of these questions was to leave the bill in the shape of Mr. GRUNDY's amendment, as printed in the beginning of the debate.

Mr. LYON then offered an amendment, which was to give to the States the right of purchasing at a reduced price the refuse lands within their limits; but withdrew it after some remarks from Messrs. CLAY of Alabama and LINN.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped that, from the importance of the measure, the Senate would consent to let it lie over for two or three days. From the votes taken to-day, it appeared that not more than two-thirds of the Senate was present, and here was a measure the effect of which was to legislate away hundreds of millions. He suggested that sufficient progress had been made in the bill for the present, and as he wished to address the Senate on it when there was a full House, he trusted that the friends of the bill would consent to a postponement.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama was not disposed to hurry the measure, and was willing to postpone it for any reasonable time. While up, he would reply to some remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky. The gentleman said that the bill was to legislate away hundreds of millions ———

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky. I will prove it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied that he challenged him to the proof, and would be glad to see how the gentleman would do it. The bill extended only to 71,000,000 of acres and a fraction, about one-half of which must have been in market and subject to private entry, at $1 25 per acre, for fifteen years and upwards, and would not bring that, while the greater part of the other half was ascertained to be of little value or unfit for cultivation. Under the provisions of the bill as it now stood, he said not an acre could be sold for less than fifty cents. He submitted to the Senate, therefore, whether it was not very extravagant to say that hundreds of millions, or even fifty or forty millions, of acres, or dollars, were involved in this measure? Why, sir, the Government has not sold from the very commencement to the 30th of September last, but about 75,000,000 of acres out of 172,374,470 acres offered for sale, in all; and the whole amount received from purchasers has been but about $106,000,000; and those sales have included, too, he most fertile and valuable lands—those of Mississippi and Louisiana, producing cotton, sugar cane, &c. How strange, then, the assertion of the Senator from Kentucky! The last clause of the bill did not propose that the lands should be reduced to fifty cents till it had been offered for seventeen years in the market He could not, therefore, imagine how the Senator came to the conclusions he did, and he hoped that no one would be frightened by his portentous forebodings. With the consent of the Senate, he would agree that the bill be laid over till the day after to-morrow, when the honorable Senator might have an opportunity of being heard. He would be glad, however, to have the bill printed as amended.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he did not mean to enter into an argument with his honorable namesake at the present time. He wished a full Senate before he went into an examination of this measure, and, when the time came, he would prove all that he had said. He would propose that the bill be postponed till Wednesday next.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama assented, and the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next.

The bill in addition to the act supplementary to the act to establish the northern boundary line of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on certain conditions, was taken up, and warmly supported by Messrs. LYON, NORVELL, SEVIER and TIPTON, and opposed by Messrs. CLAY, CRITTENDEN, WALKER and DAVIS.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to postpone the bill until the 31st day of December next, avowing himself, at the same time, friendly to it; and that he will be willing to vote for it when better times came; but, in the present embarrassed state of the Treasury, he thought the strictest economy necessary, and therefore could not vote for the bill.

After some remarks from Mr. CALHOUN in favor of the motion, and from Mr. NORVELL and TIPTON against it, the question was taken, and the motion was agreed to—yeas 23, nays 11:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Walker, White, Williams, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Fulton, Grundy Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Wall, and Young—11.

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, April 10, 1838.

Petitions were, on leave, presented by Mr. SAWYER of North Carolina, and Mr. CRAIG of Virginia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill for the erection of a Court House at Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. B. also moved that this committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution inquiring into the expediency of receding the District of Columbia, and that the subject, with a report thereon, be laid on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to postpone it till to-morrow, on the ground that the gentleman who introduced the resolution [Mr. WISE] was not then in his seat.

Mr. BOULDIN signified his assent, and the subject was postponed accordingly.

Mr. DAWSON, from the same committee, reported Senate bill, with sundry amendments, to amend the act of 31st May, 1832, respecting enrolling conveyances, etc.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS moved that the anti-duelling bill of the Senate be referred to the select committee on the subject of duelling, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary, to which it had been referred yesterday; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Gratian Ray.

Mr. HOWARD moved that the vacancy on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. PATTON, be filled; which was ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Samuel Hatten, of the State of Virginia.

Mr. HEROD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to John Brown.

Mr. CHILDS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of William A. Cuddeback.

Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made several unfavorable reports, and against the proposition to extend the pension act of 1837.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the map accompanying the President's Message, on the subject of a canal communication across the Isthmus of Panama, be printed; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. C. SHEPARD, the chart of Gore sound, North Carolina, was ordered to be lithographed on a reduced scale.

Mr. JONES of New York, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill granting an appropriation for purchasing a law library for the use of the Court of Appeals and Legislative Council of Florida.

Mr. BOND then resumed his remarks on the subject of a divorce of the public press from the patronage of the Government, and again gave way for the orders of the day without concluding.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from the Third Auditor and Commissioner of Pensions, relating to the appointment of pension agents, the time of their appointment, their compensation, the banks with which they are connected, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, was laid on the table.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1838."

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means for the purpose of specifying the amount required for the South Sea Exploring Expedition.

Mr. BRONSON, who was entitled to the floor, entered into a defence of the late and present Administrations in relation to this subject, and, though he disclaimed being opposed to the Exploring Expedition, either the late projected one or another, he was in favor of having the bill recommitted, because he thought it proper that the estimates should be furnished, and the sum necessary for carrying it on made distinct and separate from the appropriations necessary for the general service of the Navy. This was due to the country, for there had been upwards of $700,000 already expended, and the only result was that there was no longer an Exploring Squadron in existence, and the question was, should they order a new one to be fitted out? He thought not, especially in the present embarrassed condition of the Treasury; and he also doubted whether, in the present state of feeling towards the scheme, both throughout the country and in the navy, any of those great results anticipated by its friends would be produced. By and by, when the present excitement had passed away, such an expedition might be sent out that would redound to the honor of the country, and produce very beneficial results; and he would be willing to sustain it, but this was not the proper time. He was satisfied that no results, commensurate with the expenditure, would ensue from its sailing now.

Mr. B. also doubted the propriety of the appointment of Lieutenant Wilkes, not from his want of skill or experience, but from his being a junior officer, the effect of which would increase the present dissatisfaction and lead to dissensions. In reply to the argument that the money already expended would be so much thrown away, he had ascertained the loss would not exceed a thousand dollars, for nearly all the articles were required elsewhere, whereas twenty-five thousand dollars would be wanted to complete the two vessels now at New York.

Mr. B. concluded by suggesting a modification to secommit the bill, with instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means to report specifically what would be the additional sum necessary to sustain the Exploring Expedition over and above what it would be necessary to keep these vessels in the service, provided they be employed in the coast service, or in any other service.

Mr. MONTGOMERY stated that he had prepared a modification to that effect.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion to recommit the bill, for Mr. C was prepared, long since, to make a motion to strike out this appropriation altogether, and to discontinue this expedition in May next. Mr. C. then moved sundry reductions in the bill, amounting in the aggregate to $192,000, remarking that this would bring the House to a direct vote whether they would or would not continue the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. MONTGOMERY withdrew his motion, with the distinct undestanding, as he stated, that a direct vote be taken on the continuance or discontinuance of this expedition.

Mr. BRONSON disapproved of the motion of his colleague, because it contemplated a positive discontinuance of the expedition.

Mr. MERCER expressed his regret at the course proposed by the gentleman from New York, whose motion was pending.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the motion was not his own, but was made by him to bring the House to a direct vote. He was understood further to say that he should vote against it himself.

Mr. MERCER continued, and went on to show the importance of the proposed expedition, and to argue against employing the vessels as a coast surveying squadron, because a triangular survey should first be completed. He was warmly in favor of the Exploring Expedition, and remarked that the only question was whether the present Administration were competent to carry it into execution. For himself, he did not believe that, take the whole of them together, with the President and Cabinet, they all had capacity sufficient to furnish instructions for it. Still he was unwilling, even in view of this fact, that the honor of the country should be tarnished by an abandonment of the scheme. Mr. M. concluded, by defending the character of Commodore Jones.

Mr. BRONSON disclaimed having, in the remotest degree, intended to cast the slightest imputation upon the character and conduct of Commodore Jones; both of which, once for all, he pronounced to be, in his opinion, unexceptionable.

Mr. CRARY did not see what the character of Commodore Jones had to do with the question under consideration, though, if it should be gone into, Mr. C. should dissent from much of the eulogy he had heard. The history of the events demonstrated that, through the agency of this very gentleman, the whole design and intention of Congress had been changed, from an exploring to a scientific expedition, when the latter object should have been an incidental one. At all events, the failure had grown out of the collision between Commodore Jones and the Head of the Navy Department, though Mr. C. considered the latter to be no head at all, for he was utterly unfit for the station he occupied. The responsibility of the failure lay with both of them, but the immediate preparations with Commodore Jones, under whose superintendence and direction vessels were constructed, which he had represented to be well qualified for the service, when they had turned out to be unfit.

Mr. C. was opposed to the expedition originally, but he was not now inclined to desert it, and as the reasons were stronger that it should sail than at first, from the amount of money expended, he hoped it would continue, and should vote for it.

Mr. MALLORY moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following words:

"And that no part of the money appropriated in this bill shall, after the first of May next, be applied to the use of the South Sea Expedition until the further action of Congress."

Mr. MONTGOMERY accepted this as a modification.

Mr. WISE then addressed the House at length in opposition to the continuance of the expedition, and in a review of the circumstances which had produced its failure.

Mr. REED followed in support of the expedition.

Mr. CUSHMAN then demanded the previous question, but it was not seconded, only 36 voting for it.

Mr. SERGEANT was warmly in favor of the expedition, and went into an examination of the causes of its failure, which he ascribed wholly to the Executive Department, and of a piece with the mode in which it had managed all the other affairs entrusted to it, such as the Florida war, the Treasury buildings, &c. With reference to the money already expended, he regarded it as nothing compared with the dishonor that would befal the country upon the abandonment of the project, independent of the great injustice of having called a number of individuals from their private stations, and then turning them off.

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were ordered, and were—yeas 57, nays 91.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then submitted two or three verbal amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. WISE suggested to some one in favor of the expedition, for he would not move it himself, to move the insertion of a provision in the bill, as the House had determined upon the continuance of the expedition, limiting the time within which it shall sail. Fix any reasonable time, say three months, or six, or twelve, or two years, or even three; but in the name of sense, in the name of economy, he did hope the House would limit the period.

Mr. MALLORY then moved the following proviso:

"Provided, That, in officering the exploring squadron, for which appropriations are herein made, the law of the 25th of February, 1799, be not violated in any of its provisions."

Mr. M. caused an extract of the law to be read as explanatory of his object, which was, that none under a captain could be appointed to the command of vessels of war, over a certain number of guns.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

On motion,

The House adjourned.

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1838.

RETROCESSION OF THE DISTRICT.

The first business in order, was the report of the Committee for the District of Columbia against the expediency of a retrocession of the District.

Mr. BOULDIN said the report of the committee and motion had been yesterday, at the request of his colleague [Mr. HOPKINS,] postponed for his colleague [Mr. WISE,] who had moved the original resolution, until this morning. He did not see his colleague in his seat, and was willing, if he had the power to postpone the subject still, to do so again, until the mover [M. WISE,] came in.

Mr. ADAMS said there were many subjects that this House did not choose to debate, and abolition was one of them. That question would come up if the report of the committee and motion of the chairman should be debated. He wished the question taken then—

The SPEAKER said the motion was not debateable.

Mr. BOULDIN rejoined. The committee intended to avoid a debate on abolition in asking to be discharged from this.

The SPEAKRR said the question was not debateable.

Mr. BOULDIN said he moved to lay the resolution and report on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and the subject laid on the table.

At a subsequent stage,

Mr. WISE appealed to some gentleman who had voted in favor of this motion, to move a reconsideration, in order that a motion might be made to commit it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. In his opinion, a majority of Congress would be found to differ with the Committee for the District.

Mr. BOULDIN, on leave, made an explanation. He had proposed, he said, to waive making the motion till his colleague was in his seat; but it was objected to. His colleague knew that Mr. B. was willing, in the House and out of the House, that the subject of abolition should be argued, and that the people should be fully and correctly informed of all in relation to it, and that he had yielded that opinion, openly expressed, to the will of his constituents, as he believed their opinion to be, and of all the South and his friends, and the repeated expression solemnly made of the opinion of this House, contrary to his own known opinion; for he thought the South ought to know their whole danger; but the opinion of the South generally, however expressed, had been different—that of the House was different. He believed his constituents thought differently, and the committee over which he had the honor to preside, desired that he should ask to be discharged, with a view to avoid discussion on the subject of abolition, and he felt bound, under the circumstances, to hold on to the motion, and decision to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER here interposed, and reminded the gentleman that the motion was not debateable.

Mr. BOULDIN resumed his seat.

Mr. WISE would state that his object was to put this question to rest; and he appealed to Southern gentlemen to sustain him in the motion he should make.

Mr. HARLAN then made the motion solicited by Mr. WISE, to reconsider the vote laying this subject on the table.

Mr. WISE then gave notice of the motion he should make, if this should prevail.

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said he would show the gentleman from Virginia, that the question of abolition was intimately involved in this, as well as that of a change of the seat of Government.

Mr. WISE replied that it was the Abolitionists who sought to retain the District for their own purposes, and it behooved Southern men to take the ground for retrocession in order, thereby, to destroy the last hopes of the Abolitionists.

The motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 63.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Mitchell.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Claims, reported Senate bill, to provide for the issuing of patents for certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin Territory, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill concerning the Western frontier.

Mr. McKAY also reported adversely on a resolution directing an inquiry in relation to the pay of volunteers called into the service of the United States; which was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill for making an appropriation for a compilation of the laws of Florida.

DIVORCE OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted some time since by Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed also to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the Government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. BOND resumed his remarks in support of the resolution, and again continued till the expiration of the time devoted to morning business.

Mr. WISE begged leave to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] viz: when he proposed to call up the resolution laid on the table by him some days since.

Mr. HAMER was about to respond, when

Mr. PETRIKIN rose and objected.

Mr. WISE accordingly moved a suspension of the rules, but the House refused—ayes 86, noes 54, not two-thirds.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Commanding General of the Army, in answer to the inquiry whether any Seminole Indians coming in under a flag of truce, or were brought in by the Cherokee Indians, had been made prisoners by General Jesup.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, laid on the table.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The "bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States for the year 1838," was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. MALLORY, without intending to open again the discussion on this bill, for the wants of the service required its passage, but in consequence of what had been said yesterday in reference to the character of a distinguished officer, felt constrained to cause a vindicatory statement from that gentleman to be read. Mr. M. then sent the paper from Com. Jones to the Clerk's table, which was read to the House.

The statement went on to throw the whole blame of the failure of the Exploring Expedition on the Secretary of the Navy, ascribing the failure chiefly to three radical causes:

1. The inability of the Navy Commissioners to fit out the Macedonian in time.

2. The want of confidence displayed towards the commander of the proposed squadron, the continued opposition made to almost every thing proposed by him, the indefinite and unsettled plans of the Secretary of the Navy, the repeated changes in his own plans, &c.

3. The semi-official and confidential correspondence and intercourse carried on by the Secretary of the Navy with junior officers of the navy, &c.

Mr. M. then went over a review of the facts and circumstances connected with the Exploring Expedition, sustaining the positions assumed by Com. Jones, by a reference to such documents as had been laid before Congress.

Mr. M. disclaimed being opposed to such an expedition, if properly organized; but he was opposed to the present one, from the plan by which it was intended to be carried on, and he could not agree with those who thought it a light matter to set aside the law, the rules of the service, by placing a junior officer over the heads of upwards of a hundred of his seniors. It was a violation of rank, and consequently a violation of right, and it was to obviate this, that he had submitted the proviso, offered by him yesterday, though he had nothing to object to the character of Lieutenant Wilkes.

Mr. HOFFMAN explained, that though the service contained in the list many, both his juniors as well as seniors, fully competent to conduct this expedition, yet he meant to say that Mr. Wilkes was pre-eminently qualified for it, and he insisted that the appointmentment of that gentleman did not violate the rule of seniority, since the rule only applied in time of war. A selection for a command like this should be made with reference to the scientific acquirements, as well as to nautical ability, and he instanced the cases of Captain Cooke, who was made a Lieutenant for the purpose; of Captain Ross, who was chosen to command the expedition to the North Pole, while only a commander; and of Parry, who, like Cooke, was commissioned a Lieutenant for the second voyage to the North Pole. The British admiralty passed over all the senior officers, in these cases, and no complaint was ever made by them.

Mr. WISE insisted that the appointment of Lieutenant Wilkes did disparage those who were higher on the list than himself. But Mr. W. understood that Lieutenant Wilkes had not been selected in consequence of his pre-eminent scientific attainments, or his peculiar fitness, but because he had pledged himself to dismiss a part of the scientific corps, who were obnoxious to the Department; and Mr. W. asked for some information of his friend from New York on this point.

Mr. HOFFMAN could only say that such a report had never reached him.

Mr. WISE would not vouch for the truth of this charge; but it had reached him from a respectable source; and such a rumor prevailed among a branch of the service. Mr. W. understood that Mr. Reynolds, who had done so much in getting up this expedition, was to be dismissed.

Mr. HOFFMAN felt it due to state that it was Lieut. Wilkes's opinion that the scientific corps, as proposed, was larger than was necessary, and also that a portion of them could be selected from the navy itself. Mr. H. himself should regret the dismission of Mr. Reynolds, and hoped it would not take place. Of the charge alluded to, he again expressed his ignorance.

Mr. INGHAM remarked that it was the universal opinion that the scientific corps should be reduced. Indeed, it was apparent to every one at all conversant with the expedition, that it must be too large, because the corps had been originally organized with reference to a squadron twice as large as that now contemplated. Mr. I. could not bring himself to believe that the Secretary of War (who had made the appointment) had entered into any such a combination as that alluded to by Mr. WISE.

Mr. WISE had not brought a charge, nor stated that such a combination had existed, but that it was believed by some attached to the scientific corps that the opinion of Lieut. Wilkes, that the corps should be reduced, was the peculiar fitness that led to his appointment, rather than his skill and courage.

Mr. BOON said no admendment had been proposed to the bill, and all that had been said, was merely explanatory of what had been said by gentlemen on yesterday, and, therefore, a continuance of this kind of discussion was not calculated to shed any new light upon the subject. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] had said that while many of those who stood opposed in politics might be compelled to vote for extravagant appropriations, the Administration would be held responsible for the whole amount of public expenditure. Sir, [said Mr. B.] I, for one, as one of the friends and supporters of the Administration, will not shrink from my share of responsibility. And I will tell gentlemen of the Opposition, that there is another responsibility that they will be held accountable for, and that is, for the waste of time and money in making Opposition speeches, which would cost more money than the amount of appropriation that may be involved, and for their voting for the appropriation, with perhaps one or two exceptions, as was the case on the appropriation to defray the expenses of the Florida war. Mr. B. concluded his remarks by a demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, 68 to 64, the main question ordered, put, and agreed to without a division.

So the bill was passed.

RED RIVER RAFT.

The "bill making an appropriation (of $70,000) for the removal of the great raft on Red river," was also read a third time, and passed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then took up, on its third reading, the "bill making appropriations for continuing the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and for other purposes."

The question was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in an additional section, making appropriations for guard fences on the road east of the Ohio, for widening the road leading down Laurel Hill, etc.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill ceding the Cumberland road to the States through which it passes west of the Ohio, as had been done in reference to that part of it east of the river, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon.

This proposition was sustained by Messrs. UNDERWOOD and CAMPBELL, of South Carolina

Mr. BOON said he was not a little surprised at the remarks which had just fallen from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] That gentleman had declared that he considered any system of internal improvement by the General Government as being now entirely defunct! This Mr. B. was sorry to hear from a professed friend of the measure, as he had not expected to hear such a declaration from any member of a party in politics who claim to be the exclusive friends and supporters of all the great interests of the country. I, continued Mr. B. stand upon this question, at this time, precisely as I did when I first came to Congress in the year 1825. I was then, as I am now, in favor of a proper system of internal improvements by the General Government. But it seems that the gentleman from Kentucky has changed his views in reference to this subject, and he has very frankly stated his reasons for having done so; and I was pleased to hear him come out and avow his future objects in terms so bold and manly as he has done on this occasion.

The gentleman from Kentucky now proposes to cede the National road, in its present unfinished state, to the States through which the same may run, to be completed by the States respectively; and declares that he is in favor of distributing the whole of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands among the twenty-six States of this Union, for the purpose of enabling the States respectively to make their own works of internal improvement.

Sir, said Mr. B. I am utterly opposed to any system of raising revenue for the purpose of distribution among the States. Such a system was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. We have recently experienced the bad effects of a distribution of the surplus revenue among the several States. It was found that before the fourth instalment of the surplus revenue was deposited with the States, the Treasury of the United States was deficient in revenue over nine millions of dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from what source of revenue was this large surplus of 1836 derived? Surely not from duties imposed on foreign merchandise; but from the great increase of land sales by the Government. Previous to the year 1835, the receipts into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands varied from two and a half to three and a half millions of dollars per annum. In 1835 and 1836, the amount received into the Treasury from the same source increased to nearly thirty-five millions of dollars, and notwithstanding the amount since received into the Treasury from sales of the public land, your Treasury is now deficient many millions of dollars in consequence of your distribution act. And yet the gentleman from Kentucky is in favor of withholding, or withdrawing the whole amount of revenue received from the sales of the public lands from the Treasury of the United States, to be scrambled for, and wasted by the twenty-six States of the Union. Should this policy be adopted, there must, and will be, a very large deficiency in the Treasury for the ordinary purposes of Government, which will have to be made up by an increase of the tariff. Mr. B. admonished those gentlemen who were opposed to a high tariff, not to withdraw from the Treasury the revenue derived from the sales of the public lands, to be distributed among the several States, as such a policy would inevitably lead to an increase of the tariff.

Mr. B. said that neither the gentleman from Kentucky nor himself, represented a manufacturing people. Our constituents, said he, are mostly farmers and mechanics, who are the consumers of articles manufactured, and whilst he would not knowingly give a vote to operate injuriously upon the manufacturing interest of the country, he would guard the interests of his constituents against the undue influence of chartered monopolies of every kind. Mr. B. was in favor of a tariff which had for its object the raising of revenue, and the giving of reasonable and just protection to home industry. But, said he, I come to the subject more immediately under consideration. The National road now being constructed in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, has thus far progressed in conformity with the compacts between the General Government and those States, respectively, by which they were admitted into the Federal union. It was conditioned by acts of Congress, admitting those States into the Union, that two per cent. of the nett proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands should be applied under the direction of Congress, in the making of roads to those States, respectively. In Ohio, this road is completed to some twenty miles west of Columbus. In the States of Indiana and Illinois, the grubbing of the road has been completed, and considerable progress has been made in grading and erecting bridges, without any portion of the road having been completed in either of those States, and now the gentleman from Kentucky proposes that the General Government shall abandon this great national improvement, and surrender it, in its present unfinished condition, to the States through which it passes. Mr. Speaker, I will not take up more of the time of the House in discussing this question, but I will put it to gentlemen who have heretofore voted for appropriations for carrying on this great work of national importance, to say whether they are now prepared to abandon it to its fate. Sir, the construction of this road over the mountains and through the new States, has and will induce many thousands to emigrate to the West and purchase the Government lands, by which means your Treasury will be more than reimbursed for all that will be required to complete this great work. I hope, therefore, that the friends of this road will promptly reject the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, and that the bill may be passed without further delay.

After some further remarks, in opposition, by Mr. EWING;

On motion of Mr. POPE

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented the proceedings of a large meeting of citizens of Philadelphia city and county, in favor of erecting a dry dock at Philadelphia: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, four memorials signed by 335 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the alleged treaty with the Cherokee Indians might not be enforced against that tribe contrary to their will: laid on the table.

Also, several memorials on the subject of slavery; the motion to receive them being laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of that State, praying a grant of lands, upon the terms specified in the resolution, to aid in the construction of the Erie and Michigan Canal, in that State: referred, on his motion, to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of Hiram F. Winter, asking to be compensated for his invention for raising stranded and sunken vessels: referred to the Committe on Commerce and printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Gurdon S. Hubbard; which was read twice, and referred.

The bill from the House for the relief of Ebenezer A. Lester, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate, at as early a period as practicable, a statement showing what portion of the public land in the several land districts of the United States has been subject to sale, at private entry, twenty-five years and upwards.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White.

The bill for the relief of James Dutton.

The bill supplementary to the act to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit, State of Michigan.

The bill for the relief of James McMaher was taken up, and after a debate, in which Messrs. HUBBARD, KING, GRUNDY, ROBINSON, CRITTENDEN, NILES, and LINN took part, was laid on the table.

Mr. ROANE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill from the House giving the assent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of Virginia to amend the act to incorporate the Fredericksburg and Alexandria Railroad company, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. KING gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill granting to the Selma and Tennessee Railroad company an entire section of land on the Tennessee river, where the road terminates, and also granting to said company the right of way through the public lands.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. WALKER rose and called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. BUCHANAN] to the state of our relations with Mexico. It would be recollected, he said, that this subject was recommended to the consideration of the Senate by a special message from the President of the United States on the 7th of February, 1837.

Here Mr. W. read extracts from the message, which recommends, "that to avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, (one more opportunity should be given to atone for the past before taking redress into our own hands,) with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction, if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it." The message adds: "To this end, I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and that the use of the naval force of the United States by the Executive against Mexico, to enforce them, in the event of a refusal by the Mexican Government to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof, made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico." This message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and on the 18th February following, Mr. BUCHANAN, the chairman of that committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government; the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

On the 27th of February, 1837, this resolution was unanimously adopted by the Senate by a vote of ayes 47, noes none. Now, said Mr. W. we all know that this demand has been again made, and that it has been ineffectual; that new insults and injuries have been superadded by Mexico since this period; that her departing Minister had grossly insulted this Government and country, and his conduct had been approved by Mexico; that her Secretary of Foreign Affairs had recently published a report most insulting to our national honor; and to close the long list of Mexican outrages, her vessels of war had recently, in our own seas, fired upon an American steamboat, carrying the American flag, and prosecuting a lawful commerce, with a neighboring and friendly power. This vessel had not only been fired upon, and an attempt made to capture her, but the balls had been fired through the American flag, as if in derision of the idea that this flag constituted any protection against Mexican outrages. The flag of our country had ceased then to be any protection to the American citizen, in our own vessels, and upon our own seas, as indeed the name of an American had long ceased to protect our citizens within the limits of Mexico. Not only had it ceased to be any protection there, but it constituted an invitation to insult, imprisonment, and spoliations. More than a year had elapsed since the adoption of the resolution above referred to. The justice of our claims on Mexico was then declared to be undoubted, and, if speedy redress was not granted, the Senate resolved unanimously that prompt measures would be required to sustain "the honor of the nation and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens." No redress has been, it is clear none will be, granted by Mexico; but every day's delay on our part only witnesses new outrages and new insults. Mr. W. said he was informed by a most respectable citizen of Pennsylvania, lately residing in Mexico, and well known to the honorable chairman, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] that our commerce, carried on by our resident merchants in Mexico, had been reduced from three millions to three hundred thousand dollars per annum; and that, unless some means were speedily taken to protect our citizens from Mexican spoliations and insults, this commerce would soon be entirely extinguished. Four months and upwards had now elapsed since the commencement of this session, and no report had been made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and no intimation given when, if ever, any report might be expected.

Mr. W. then rose to inquire of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] if it was the intention of the committee to report upon this subject; and if so, when a report might be expected. Mr. W. said he desired no war with any foreign power, much less with such a power as Mexico, nor did he think a war would be necessary. If Congress would do what the French Government was now doing, send a sufficient squadron to demand instantaneous redress, and, if not granted, then to blockade the ports of Mexico; redress would then be granted, and never till then; but new insults and injuries would be accumulated.

Mr. BUCHANAN (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) said that he had no objection whatever to answer the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Mississippi. All that he could object to, if he were disposed to be hypercritical, was the observations of the Senator preceding the interrogatory. The Senator had given day and date, and circumstance, and all connected with the resolution which the committee had reported at the last regular session of Congress on the subject of our claims against Mexico, evidently for the purpose of showing that our present apparent listlessness was inconsistent with our former energy. This was not the case. There was no indisposition on the part of the committee to make a report on this subject whenever it might be proper. He could safely say, that there was not one of them who felt disposed to shrink from the responsibility of acting up to the spirit and letter of the resolution which they had reported, and which had received the unanimous sanction of the Senate.

The committee had held a number of informal consultations on the subject, and had come to the conclusion that it was proper to await the action of the House of Representatives. The next step we take, said Mr. B. in regard to Mexico, must be some measure that may directly lead to war, or war itself; because he thought every honorable means of conciliation had been exhausted. Now where ought such a measure to be introduced? We have, said he, examined the public archives, and find that from the origin of the Government to the present day, no such measure has originated in the Senate. Coercive measures had always originated with the immediate representatives of the people; not certainly for the want of constitutional power in the Senate; but most probably because the House of Representatives emanated more immediately from, and were more directly responsible to, the people, who must bear the burdens of war; and under the Constitution, the House alone could originate the revenue bills without which war could not be prosecuted.

He had made it his business to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House, and had been informed by that gentleman that the committee had then the subject under their most serious consideration, and might be expected to come to some conclusion upon it within a few days. Under these circumstances, the committee of the Senate were of opinion that they ought, at the very least, to wait a reasonable time, for the purpose of affording the popular branch of the Legislature an opportunity of expressing their opinion. This delay was rendered more proper from the consideration, that whilst the Senate, at the last regular session, had adopted the resolution reported by their Committee on Foreign Relations, the House had not then expressed any opinion on the subject. The report of their committee had not been acted upon.

Such, said Mr. B. are the feelings and impressions of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If he had mistaken them, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] whom he observed in his place, could correct him.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said the Senator from Pennsylvania had stated correctly what had occurred, and he perfectly agreed with him that the proper course was to leave the matter to the direction of the House of Representatives—the popular branch of the National Legislature. The present embarrassed state of the Treasury, which had been so feelingly alluded to by Senators on other occasions, and the present distracted state of the currency, should prevent, at least for the present, any resort to belligerent steps. While up, he would ask a question which probably the Senator from Mississippi could answer. He (Mr. C.) had been informed, but he hoped incorrectly, that the Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States, although appointed last winter one year, had never yet reached Mexico. An American citizen, residing in that city, had told him that the Minister had not arrived when he left Mexico, He (Mr. C.) would like to ascertain the fact, and learn where the Minister had been, and when he would be likely to reach there, &c.

Mr. WALKER said, in reply to the question propounded to him by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY] that our Minister to Mexico, he believed, was still in this country; but his nomination was contingent, and the contingency had not occurred upon which our Minister could depart for Mexico. Mr. W. would say one word in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] He could not agree that the Senate could with propriety delay to act upon this subject until the House acted; but if it was our duty to wait a reasonable period, that period has long since elapsed. The Senate had the same constitutional power as the House, it was conceded, to originate even a declaration of war. The Senate represents the States in their sovereign capacity; and is the honor of these States less dear to the Senate than it is to the House of Representatives? and if the House, as I do not intend now to intimate, should delay or refuse to originate the necessary measures to vindicate the National honor, must the Senate submit, and refuse to exercise their constitutional power, in regard to a subject over which the Constitution gives the same power to the Senate as to the House of Representatives? If the Senate is bound to wait the action of the House on such a subject, would it not, on the same principles, be bound to adopt the opinions of the House when it did act, however different might be the views of this body? Mr. W. said he was unwilling to place the Senate in any such humiliating attitude. Why have a Committee of Foreign Relations of the Senate, if, as regards the most important of these relations, we are to wait and abide by the action of the House of Representatives? The Senate was, with the President, the sole treaty-making, as well as on these subjects, an equal and co-ordinate branch of the law-making, power, and whenever a proper case occurs for the exercise of the powers confided to us by the Constitution, our constitutional duties are measured by our constitutional powers, and it is no excuse for delay or inaction on our part that the House delays or refuses to act upon a subject in regard to which the powers of both Houses are admitted to be equal. In relation to the pecuniary claims of our citizens against Mexico, it was, however just those claims might be, entirely unimportant, when compared to the actual outrages committed by that Government upon our flag and our citizens. Some gentlemen seemed to think that the late attack upon the Columbia is the first instance of the kind that has occurred. Why, sir, said Mr. W. there are at least half a dozen cases of insults to our flag, and direct violence previously committed upon our citizens by Mexico, equally as atrocious as the case of the Columbia; and if the nation does not speedily interpose to protect its honor, it will be regarded as having no honor to protect, and thus invite aggressions from other powers.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky deprecated the discussion as irregular and out of place. Nevertheless, he felt it due to himself, as a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and due to the Senate and to the country, to say, that while there was strong ground of complaint against Mexico, if we looked to the correspondence that had taken place on this subject, we would find that on our part there was much cause for deep and serious regret. What were the facts in the case? A Mr. Greenhow, a clerk in one of the public offices, was despatched to Mexico with a large mass of documents, containing the claims of our citizens, which were to be examined and reported on within ten days, or Mr. Greenhow was to return. Now those at all acquainted with the manner of doing business in the public offices, must know that it would have been impossible to have carefully examined them in so many weeks. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mexico proceeded to take up these documents, and examine them one by one, admitting the justice of some, and rejecting others; and while these matters were still in progress, suddenly the whole subject is thrown upon Congress, the President telling that body he had no further negotiations to make with Mexico.

Whenever a clear case was made out, he [Mr. C.] was ready to enforce on Mexico what was due to law and justice. No man was more ready, nor more willing, than himself to do all that was necessary to sustain the honor and dignity of the nation, and to exact from others reparation for all wrongs that our citizens may have been made to suffer. While he would go thus far, he could not help saying, and all who looked to the correspondence must admit the truth, that the want of dignity and the want of temper that had been manifested by persons connected with the Government in relation to this whole matter, was greatly to be deplored.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that although this debate was entirely irregular, it had become necessary for him to say something more on the subject, even in regard to the remarks of his colleague on the committee, who had just addressed the Senate, [Mr. CLAY.]

Our complaints against Mexico were of a two-fold character. The Government of that country had not only refused to pay the just claims of our injured citizens, but, in several instances, had assailed our national honor, and insulted our national flag. For assaults and injuries of this description, pecuniary redress had never been demanded, and could never be accepted. No suitable explanation of these insults had ever been given, and no satisfaction had ever been rendered, although often demanded. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky had not touched this part of the case. A gross insult had recently been offered to the American flag, of a character requiring the most prompt and effectual redress, if we were to credit the statement published in the New Orleans papers which had lately reached this city. It appeared that a steamboat, under the American flag, pursuing her lawful commerce in our own sea, had been repeatedly fired upon and brought to by two Mexican vessels of war. In this situation, the engineer let the steam escape; and the noise so terrified these Mexican heroes, that they fell flat on their faces on the decks of their vessels, and the steamboat was thus suffered to escape. Such was the account of this affair, given in the New Orleans Bee, and signed by the passengers in the steamboat, several of whom were known to be gentlemen of respectability by members of the Senate.

Mr. B. said he could present to the Senate, if this were the proper occasion, a number of other cases in which the honor of the American flag had been violated by Mexican officers with perfect impunity. He believed that the Senator from Kentucky would be as unwilling as any other man to suffer these insults to be passed over without any redress.

In regard to the claims of American citizens upon the Mexican Government for pecuniary redress, which had been spoken of by the Senator from Kentucky, the Mexican Secretary of State had pursued a most absurd course; but whether by design or accident, he would not at present express an opinion. After repeated and unavailing attempts had been made to obtain satisfaction for these claims, a solemn and formal demand was made upon the Mexican Government for redress, in July last, by our Secretary of State, in obedience to the stipulations of the treaty. A list of these claims was presented to the Mexican Secretary, by Mr. Greenough, a special agent appointed for this purpose, verified by competent proof. This, under the treaty, was a necessary preliminary to war or reprisals. All these claims had been examined by our Secretary of State, and none were presented which, in his opinion, were not founded upon justice. Now what course had the Mexican Secretary adopted? He had obtained possession, in some unaccountable manner, of a copy of the printed list of all the claims, good, bad, and indifferent, in which this Government had ever been asked by individuals to interpose, and which had been transmitted to Congress on a former occasion by General

Jackson. Accordingly, he went to work upon this list, instead of that which had been transmitted to him by the Secretary of State, and furnished formal answers in some ten or fifteen of the cases; in a majority of which no demand had been made by Mr. Forsyth upon the Mexican Government. Of course, these answers were triumphant in such cases as had been abandoned by our own Government.

[Mr. CLAY here observed that some of the claims had been admitted.]

Mr. B. resumed. In one or two of the other cases presented in the official list, the justice of the claims was admitted; but no rational prospect of payment was presented. At the rate of progression with which the Mexican Secretary had hitherto proceeded, it would be years before he could go through this old printed list; and from any thing which appeared, the claimants would be as far from obtaining actual indemnification at the end of this process as they were in the beginning.

He would be as far from censuring the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House for remissness, as he was confident they were from deserving it. They best knew when and how to act for themselves. He had no desire to hurry their action, or interfere with it in any manner. He had no doubt they would do their duty. If the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] still remained unsatisfied with our conduct, let him introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to act promptly and report a war measure. From the spirit he had evinced, he appears anxious to go to war at once. For his own part, Mr. B. said, he had no disposition to act in so hasty a manner. If he moved slowly towards his object, he trusted he should move surely.

Mr. PRESTON, after making some remarks on the strong measures recommended by the Executive in relation to the affairs with Mexico, was glad that the Committee on Foreign Relations had not responded to the belligerent features recommended in the communication to Congress; for so long as there was the slightest hope that we could have our claims on that power settled without proceeding to ulterior means, he was willing to wait. War was always to be avoided, if possible; and, most of all, was it incumbent on us not to engage in it from pecuniary or sordid motives, so long as there existed the slightest chance of a proper settlement without it. But with regard to the insult offered to our flag, that was another matter. If the facts were as stated by gentlemen, why had they not been communicated by the Executive? Either the representations were exaggerated by rumor, or the Executive had failed to do his duty. If, however, it was true that our flag had been insulted in our own sea, (the Gulf of Mexico,) mare nostrum, as the Romans said of their own Mediterranean, he would be as ready and willing as any man to preserve unsullied that flag; and whether the insult was offered by a proud and haughty nation, or from a weak and impotent power, like that of Mexico, it should not pass with impunity.

Mr. BENTON said that the question as to how the debate originated, was easily answered. It commenced with an inquiry very properly made by the Senator from Mississippi of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which led to an explanation which all heard. He was one of those who saw and read in the New Orleans papers, the statement made by the passengers in the steamboat Columbia. That vessel was brought to by two Mexican vessels of war, fired into, and compelled to lie to, till by the noise occasioned by the engineer letting off his steam, the Mexicans were frightened away, and the steamboat escaped. We see in this, said Mr. B. that the flag of the United States was no protection to its citizens. It was the escape pipe letting off the steam that saved the passengers, and not the flag of the United States. Since then, he had read in the New Orleans papers that the passengers in the same steamboat about sailing from New Orleans, placing no reliance on the flag of the United States, had armed themselves, as if against pirates; and it was further stated in the same papers, that when the vessel left the wharf, a vast number of persons crowded down to take leave of their friends going in a perilous enterprise. Now the point he wished to call the attention of the Senate to, was that the flag of the United States, in our own sea, mare nostrum, was no protection to the American citizen —he must trust to his arms. With respect to that rashness and precipation, ill temper and want of dignity, with which this Government was charged by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] for breaking off the negotiations to obtain redress for our injuries inflicted by Mexico, it was within his knowledge, and not from any information derived from Mexico, that the charge had no foundation. One of the cases was derived from Missouri. Two of its citizens, Julius De Mun, and Auguste Choteau, engaged in trade on the Arkansas river, under the license of the Governor of Missouri, and with a capital of $30,000, trading with our own Indians, and in our own territory; these citizens were seized upon by 200 Mexican dragoons from Santa Fe, one of them compelled to go up and down the river, under an escort of Mexican dragoons, to show a fort that they alleged was building to garrison 20,000 men for the purpose of invading Mexico; and when he could show no fort, he and his companion were carried to Santa Fe, and thrown into a dungeon for forty days. This was not all. They were brought to trial, and De Mun, understanding the Spanish language, repeatedly heard the Governor say to his officers, "these men must be shot." But they were not shot, though their property, $30,000 worth, was taken from them, and they, with their followers, forty in number, without arms, and without subsistence of any kind, were turned loose to make their way back, 900 miles, through a wilderness infested by tribes of savages of the worst description. They arrived safe at St. Louis, and, immediately on their arrival, made known their grievances to our Government, and from that day to this they have not received one particle of redress. All this took place twenty years ago, and although the claims of these injured citizens have been frequently pressed upon the Mexican Government, supported by the most indubitable testimony, they have not received remuneration for their property to the value of one cent. After all this, said Mr. B. we are told of precipitation, and the Administration is to be accused of rashness for breaking off the negotiations, when every man believes that if we were to negotiate till doomsday we should be as far off from redress as ever. No, sir, said Mr. B. our citizens have been plundered, our soil invaded, and our flag insulted, and we have not received, nor are we likely to receive, from that Government, one word of apology or atonement.

Mr. KING thought the debate exceedingly ill-timed, and he regretted the manner in which it had been brought up. Being a member of the committee, he had concurred with them that, under all the circumstances of the case, it would be better for the Senate to wait for the action of the House of Representatives, and he still entertained that opinion. He was a little surprised at the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, censuring the Administration as having acted rashly and with precipitation in terminating the negotiation where they did. Surely no one would look into the documents communicated by the Government, without seeing that the greatest forbearance had been exercised for years towards Mexico, and that this Government had acted towards that power with a leniency that it would not have shown to the most powerful Government of Europe; in fact, that it had forborne till forbearance ceased to be a virtue. After all this, they were now told by the Senator from Kentucky that the President had acted with unnecessary heat and precipitation in suspending all further demands for redress, and submitting the whole affair to the action of Congress. The Administration, said Mr. K. was very unfortunately situated. The Senator from South Carolina complained that the President had been remiss in his duty in not communicating the fact of the late outrage on the steamboat Columbia to Congress, while the Senator from Kentucky, on the other hand, charged the Government with being too rash and precipitate. Why, sir, the information as to the outrage on the Columbia had been received here only two or three days past, and that, too, by a slip cut from a New Orleans paper and forwarded by the Express mail; and there was no reason to believe that the Government had as yet received any authentic or official account of the affair, though there was no doubt as to the truth of the circumstances connected with it. He himself knew the names of several of the persons signed to the statement in the newspapers, and he would take the occasion to say that they were gentlemen of respectability and veracity But would the Senator from South Carolina have the President make a newspaper statement the subject of a grave communication to Congress? This would, indeed, be acting with a degree of rashness and precipitation, of which the Senator from Kentucky would well have a right to complain.

He was fully aware that his friend from Mississippi had strong feelings on the subject. He knew his high and chivalrous devotion to the honor of his country. But while he was so regardful of the honor and interests of his own country, would he incur the risk of violating the rights of others? Let him, Mr. K. said, wait a reasonable time, and if atonement is not made, then let him recommend the course of action which honor requires. The course of the Mexican Government could be defended by no one. Still it was not necessary for the Senate to be hurried into any hasty action with regard to her. But when the time arrived when it should become necessary to act, he for one would be prepared to go any lengths necessary to vindicate our national honor, and protect our citizens from outrage or injury. He knew that many of the cases of complaint against Mexico would not bear scrutiny, and this was the case of the one brought up by his friend from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] for the injury there complained of was not committed under the present Government of Mexico, but by the officers of Spain.

That, however, was not now the question. All that he rose to say was to rescue the Government of the United States from the charges of the Senator from Kentucky, and to maintain that it had manifested the greatest forbearance and conciliation towards a Government that had been for years insulting our flag, and plundering our citizens, and evading, by the most flimsy pretexts, our demands for redress. The Senator from Kentucky asks, why is not our Minister to Mexico at his post? The Senator knew, or should know, that the state of things had not arisen under which the Minister, appointed during the last session, was to go to Mexico. For what purpose make it a cause of complaint? Mr. Ellis was nominated for that mission when it was known that all diplomatic intercourse with Mexico had terminated, and would not be resumed until a favorable answer should be returned to the final demand for redress, about to be sent by a special messenger. Our Minister had withdrawn from that country; and their Minister had left here, scattering his calumnies behind him. In this state of things the President, in a spirit of conciliation highly creditable to him, nominated Mr. Ellis as Minister to Mexico, in the following words, "to be sent whenever circumstances will permit a renewal of diplomatic intercourse honorably with that power." Would it, he would ask of the Senator from Kentucky, be consistent with our high sense of honor to send a Minister to that Republic while our final and solemn appeal to them for justice was unanswered? He knew that the Senator from Kentucky would not be of opinion that we should send a Minister there while the outrages and injuries of which we have so often complained, remained unatoned for. He had no intention in rising (said Mr. K.) to protract this unnecessary debate. All he rose for was, first to vindicate the Administration from the charge of precipitancy and want of forbearance; secondly, for not having communicated the circumstances of the late outrage to Congress; and lastly, to explain why it would not be proper for our Minister to go to Mexico in the present state of our affairs with that country.

Mr. CLAY still maintained that there had been a precipitancy shown in the matter, unbecoming the Executive of a great nation. Many of the claims set up against Mexico were not based on justice, and, as such, were rejected. Of this character he might say was that alluded to by the Senator from Missouri; Mexico only became an independent nation in 1824, while the claim of Chouteau and others originated many years before, when Mexico was a province of Spain. That demand ought, therefore, rather to have been pressed at Madrid than at Mexico. Where was the injury to accrue from a spirit of forbearance? Had we not waited with France, with Spain, with Naples, and with Holland?

If the present were a suitable and proper time to go into this subject, it would only be necessary for him to advert to the correspondence to establish all he had said. Had not the clerk, Greenhow, been sent to Mexico, with instructions that, if an answer was not given within ten days, he should return back again? Well, what did Mexico do? Why, the Secretary of State proceeded with as much despatch as ministers usually do, and instructions were made out to the Mexican Minister here, showing that the claims were undergoing revision, and that fourteen of them had already been examined; and while the rest were yet in progress, the President of the United States throws the whole matter upon Congress. The demand was such, in the first place, as no power, having a proper respect for itself, would have permitted; and in the second, would not have been complied with, because much of the evidence bearing upon these claims was at Vera Cruz, and other places distant from Mexico. He [Mr. C.] would repeat what he had before observed, that he was as ready as any man in the nation to exact justice, and to vindicate the honor and the glory of the country. With respect to the affair of the steamboat, it was not before us at present. It had not been communicated to us in an official shape, and he therefore thought it would be premature to mix up that affair with the other matters, to excite angry feelings for the purpose of precipitating us, at a time when the Treasury was empty, with so weak and impotent a power as that of Mexico.

Mr. BENTON would make a single remark in relation to the claim of Mr. Choteau and others, as he had alluded to that peculiar case of tyranny and injustice on the part of the Spanish authorities. The depredation on the property of these American citizens was committed in 1817, pending the revolution which eventuated in their independence of Mexico; it was committed, too, by the local authorities, and no doubt could be entertained that Mexico was responsible for the wrong, by the law of nations.

Mr. WALKER said he merely rose to give notice that, if no report were made in regard to our relations with Mexico, within a short period, either in the Senate or the House of Representatives, he would move a resolution to test the sense of the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN was extremely sorry to prolong this unprofitable discussion, and he did not care how soon the Senator from Mississippi introduced his resolution. Had any person here intimated that, under the Constitution, the Senate could not originate a war measure? Certainly not. It did not follow, however, that it was our duty to do every thing which we had the power to do, without regard to propriety or expediency; and in a case of this kind, he thought there was great propriety, as well as expediency, in leaving the introduction of any coercive measure to the House of Representatives. They came immediately from the people, and returned sooner to the people to give an account of their conduct. Besides, they, and they alone, could originate the revenue bills, by means of which war was to be conducted. Any attempt on our part improperly to hurry them, or to censure their delay, might arouse feelings which would retard, rather than accelerate, their action. He should be glad the Senator from Mississippi would introduce his resolution, and take a vote of the Senate upon the question.

A few words in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. So far as he had stated the question, he had stated it correctly; but he had commenced at the conclusion, and it was proper that the Senate and the country should understand the origin and progress of our existing difficulties with Mexico. He admitted that if the late demand upon that Government for justice to our citizens had been the first which was ever made, it would have been pretty prompt and energetic. But this was far from being the case. Our citizens had for many years been suffering repeated and aggravated injuries from Mexico, without any pretext or apology whatever, unless it might be found in the fact that, during almost the whole period of its existence, the Government of that country had been in a revolutionary state. It might be true that some of our claims were not well founded; but there were many others of the justice of which there could not be a doubt. If any Senator would take the trouble of reading all the documents, he would find that redress had been over and over again demanded, and this Government had been put off, year after year, under the pretence that further time was necessary to collect proofs, and other reasons equally frivolous. Of all these claims, redress had not been obtained, according to his recollection, in a single instance; and to all human appearance we were now as far from it as ever. After having foreborne, on account of our friendly feelings towards a sister republic, until forbearance was no longer a virtue, General Jackson sent a message to Congress, at the last regular session, recommending reprisals upon a contingency with the nature of which he need not now detain the Senate. The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, upon examining the treaty with Mexico, they found that, before reprisals could be resorted to, another and more formal demand must be made in the manner prescribed by one of the articles of that treaty. It was the tone and manner of this last demand, and the short time allowed for an answer, of which the Senator from Kentucky had complained. In his, Mr. B's opinion, this article of the treaty, which required the last demand, and specified the form, was exceedingly impolitic and unwise; a remark which he thought might be made with justice, in regard to several provisions in our modern treaties. Had it not been for this article, there was no reason, either in justice or in the law of nations, why we might not have resorted to coercive measures without any such formal proceeding. Demands had been made previously, again and again, for many years, without the slightest success; unless we might except the case in which a Mexican officer was removed from his station for a gross insult to our flag, but was rewarded a short time afterwards by being elevated to a higher station.

A state of things now existed in regard to Mexico requiring the most prompt and energetic action. If something should not soon be done to bring that Government to reason, our commercial intercourse with them, secured by the faith of treaties, must be abandoned. He had been assured, from authority on which he relied, that neither the American name, nor the American flag, was any protection to American citizens in Mexico. They were rapidly leaving that country, where they had a right to engage in lawful trade, having in vain appealed to the Government of their own country for protection. American citizens were now afraid to go to Mexico at all.

Mr. B. believed that the most prompt and energetic measures had now become necessary, and that a resort to them would be the most certain means of avoiding war. He could not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that any considerations, as to the deranged state of our paper currency, should be taken into view in deciding this question. If the national honor demanded vindication, he could not consent that we should be arrested by the present state of the Treasury. This little cloud, Mr. B. said, would soon pass away, and the boundless resources of our country were yet unimpaired. The Senator from Kentucky himself, unless he had greatly mistaken his character, would be one of the last men to suffer the flag of his country to be outraged, and the property of our citizens plundered with impunity, merely because the banks had suspended specie payments. Millions to defend our rights, but not a cent for tribute.

Mr. GRUNDY rose, and observed that, as the Graduation bill was about to be taken up, he wished gentlemen interested in it to make as much progress with it as in their power, and, if possible, terminate the discussion on it before the end of the week, as he should feel it to be his duty to ask the Senate on Monday next to take up the bill to prohibit the issuing and circulating the bills and notes of the old United States Bank.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands; when

Mr. CLAY of Ky. addressed the Senate at some length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GRUNDY then rose and submitted an amendment, to render the bill as already amended by him more perfect, and to do away with the possibility of a misconstruction of it, i. e. to make it operate only on lands that have been offered at public sale.

After some remarks from Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, CLAY of Kentucky, and GRUNDY, the amendment was agreed to.

After the consideration of executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, April 12, 1838.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, on leave, presented sundry petitions on the subject of the late duel.

Mr. McKENNAN also presented two petitions on the same subject.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. NAYLOR asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, at as early a time as practicable, whether the number of the scientific corps appointed to the Exploring Expedition has been, or is to be reduced; and if so, to communicate the names of those who are to be dismissed; copies of their appointments, and causes of the reduction, as also copies of all letters and correspondence which have passed between them, or either of them, and the Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of War, Commissioners of the Navy Board, or any other agent or officer of the United States, relative to the matters connected with the objects, preparation, outfit, and sailing of the Expedition.

Objection being made, Mr. N. moved a suspension of the rule, but the House refused.

Mr. NAYLOR asked leave also to submit the following:

"Whereas a resolution has passed this House on the 7th of December last, requesting the President of the United States 'to furnish to this House (among other things) copies of all letters, documents, and communications, which have passed between the Secretary of the Navy, the Commissioners of the Navy Board, the officers or persons relative to all matters connected with the preparation, outfit, and sailing of the Exploring Expedition; And, whereas, This House has not yet been furnished with the documents, letters, and communications called for, although upwards of four months have elapsed since the passage of the resolution, and the session is now drawing towards a close; therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the the United States be requested to inform this House whether or not he intends to comply with the request of this resolution, by transmitting the copies of the documents, letters, and papers called for; and why they have not long since been furnished."

Objection being made, Mr. N. moved a suspension of the rule, when, on taking the question, the ayes were 28, noes 57, no quorum.

Mr. HAYNES moved a call of the House.

Mr. McKENNAN appealed to his colleague to withdraw his motion, but he did not assent.

Mr. PETRIKEN asked for the yeas and nays on the call, which were ordered, and were yeas 58, nays 63, so the House refused the call.

The question then recurring on the motion to suspend the rule,

Mr. INGHAM stated that the correspondence was very voluminous, and would be sent in in a very few days.

The House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. HAYNES asked leave to move a reference to the Post Office Committee, but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. POPE, the vacancy on the Library Committee, occasioned by the resignation of Mr. PATTON, was directed to be filled up.

On motion of Mr CAMBRELENG, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Superintendent of the Southwest Executive Building, and the same was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio asked leave to make a suggestion to the House in relation to the business on the private calendar. The bill for the establishment of a commission of claims had been made the special order for Friday next, and Mr. W. would suggest the expediency and propriety of extending that order, and to-morrow and next day taking up and acting on such bills as would not elicit debate, so that they might be sent to the other branch.

Mr. CAMBRELENG concurred with the gentleman in the propriety of acting on some of the private bills, but he thought the proper course would be to annul the special order, suffer the regular business to progress, and thereby leaving the House at liberty to take up the other bill at some other time.

Mr. WHITTLESEY could not assent to this, and preferred an extension of the special order.

The conversation then dropped.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Herman Harris.

TEXAS BOUNDARY.

Mr. YELL begged leave to propound an inquiry to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It would be recollected that some time since a memorial had been presented to the House by him, and referred to that committee, on the subject of the boundary line between the United States and Texas. His apology for propounding the question would be found in the importance of the subject, not only to the State he had the honor to represent, but to the General Government; for that of Texas had opened a land office within what had been heretofore considered the limits of the United States, and were selling the land there.

Mr. HOWARD [the chairman of the committee] replied, that the committee had held but one meeting since that subject was referred to them; and then they found themselves in other matters of urgent importance. He could, however, state to the gentleman that he was himself aware of the propriety of some further action of Congress on this subject; and he should avail himself of the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of Congress to it.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Hazard Knowles.

WYOMING FLAG.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the select committee raised on the subject, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver up to the people of that valley the Wyoming flag, now in the War Department, in case the people thereof desire.

Mr. U. made a statement in relation to this subject, stating that there were a number of misstatements and inaccuracies in Botta's history of the battle; in fact, wholly misrepresenting the whole affair. Mr. U. also corrected an erroneous impression in relation to the flag. It was not the flag of the ancestors of the people of Wyoming, as had been at first supposed, but that of the enemy.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that as the flag was not that of the Wyoming fort, but of the enemy, and as no general petition had come on from the district asking for it, but only one from a single individual, and as several respectable men from that section now in this city had stated that they did not want this banner, he moved to lay the resolution on the table. Mr. P. however, temporarily withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. POTTER, who made a very interesting and curious statement in relation to the bloody massacre at Wyoming, exposing the gross and glaring falsehoods of the history of it by Botta. Mr. P's speech will be given as soon as it can be prepared.

Mr. PETRIKIN then renewed his motion, which prevailed, and the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House passed to the orders of the day.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois" was then resumed, on its third reading, and concurrence with the committee of the whole in their amendments.

The question was on the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report, in lieu thereof, a bill ceding the road to the States through which it passes.

Mr. EWING moved a proviso thereto, to the effect that the surrender should take place only in the event of an equal amount of money having been expended on the road west, that there had been on that east of the river prior to the surrender of the latter portion thereof.

Mr. POPE, who was entitled to the floor, opposed the proposition of his colleague, both on the ground of expediency, and as requiring the Committee of Ways and Means to perform a duty which was not within their province. Mr. P. then went into the subject at some length, in order to demonstrate the binding and existing validity of the compact between the United States and those States, and the expediency and propriety of completing this great work.

Mr. HOLSEY replied to Mr. POPE, and denied the force of the special compact set up as a precedent for this work, that the other States had ever consented to it, or that it was of any validity, since the States which derived the sole benefit had given no consideration for it. Mr. H. supported the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD at considerable length.

Mr. ROBERTSON followed on the same side.

Mr. RARIDEN replied to the objections urged against the measure, and went into a history of the various enactments on the subject, &c. warmly urging its passage.

Mr. ATHERTON gave his views against the bill, and the whole system of internal improvements by the General Government, and in support of the motion to recommit the bill, disclaiming, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, his having given an assent to the bill being reported.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. GOODE and MERCER, in support of the bill; when

Mr. HAYNES took the floor, and yielded to a general exclamation to adjourn; and on his motion,

The House adjourned.

CORRECTION.—In the brief sketch of Mr. CAMBRELENG's first remarks in last evening's Globe, on his motion to bring the House to a direct vote on the Exploring Expedition, there is some confusion, as will be seen by referring to the subsequent remarks of Mr. C. which are consistent with the following:

Mr. C. said that he had anticipated a motion to strike out the appropriation for the Exploring Expedition, and was prepared to furnish the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MONTGOMERY] with the amount of the reduction which would be required under each head, in case the House should decide to discontinue it after the 1st of May. He suggested to the gentleman to withdraw his motion to recommit the bill, and to move to reduce the appropriations, so that the House might come to a direct vote upon it. Mr. C. himself should vote against the reduction, and in favor of the expedition, but made the suggestion to enable the House to come to a direct vote, and to facilitate the passage of the bill.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 12, 1838.

Mr. McKEAN presented the petition of a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the late treaty made with the Cherokees may be considered: laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the proceedings of a meeting held in the county of Washington, Penn. on the subject of the late duel, and recommending Congress to pass a law prohibiting any person who shall be engaged in a duel, from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The act supplementary to the act entitled an act to provide for the adjustment of titles to lands in the town of Detroit, State of Michigan, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, directed, in settling and adjusting the pay of the Senators, to deduct from the per diem allowance, the number of days any Senator may hereafter absent himself from the Senate, without first obtaining leave of absence, unless he may be unavoidably detained from his seat by his own sickness.

Mr. GRUNDY said it would be better to take up the resolution, and decide upon it at once, as he thought it contained an implied censure upon the conduct of Senators of that body. It did not, however, apply to him individually, for he believed he might safely say that he had never lost a day from his public duties in his life, when well enough to attend to them. It was objectionable in another point of view: though the money was but a small matter, yet how was the Secretary to ascertain, unless he called a roll, as they did in camp, who were and who were not absent? Besides, Senators had frequently to attend the public offices upon the business of their constituents, and business connected with their duties in the Senate. Mr. G. had no doubt but the Senator from Michigan was actuated by the best motives, but he thought the resolution uncalled for, and he hoped it would be disposed of at once, either by laying it on the table or rejecting it.

The CHAIR said that as the consideration of the resolution was objected to, there was no question before the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL trusted that he would at least be permitted to reply to the Senator from Tennessee. He did not offer this resolution without consultation, nor without consideration; and, notwithstanding the opinions of the Senator from Tennessee, he still thought that its adoption would produce some practical benefit. We have seen, he continued, for weeks, the Senate frequently doing business without a quorum, and several times the business actually suspended for want of one So far as he was personally concerned, it was known to the Senate that he was not subject to a charge of want of liberality in money matters; he was sorry to say that the reverse was applicable to him. But there must be some mode adopted to keep a quorum of the body in attendance. It was not right that Senators should be sitting here, laboring from day to day, while others were absent in the pursuit of their own business, or of pleasure. His object was not to save money, but to adopt some means of inducing Senators to attend to their duties, and to the great business and interests of the nation.

Mr. BENTON said there was already a rule of the Senate which forbid any member to be absent without leave. When he first came here, eighteen years ago, it was a regular thing to ask leave when a Senator wished to absent himself; in later days, however, leave was never asked; men go off, and stay off, to the prejudice of the public business. He had known instances where business had been delayed; and more: he would say that he had also known instances where it had been precipitated in consequence of such absence, and he felt pleased that the Senator from Michigan had introduced the subject. The deduction of the money was matter of little moment; but it was a matter of some moment that Senators should not be absent at a time when their services were wanted for the public business.

The resolution, according to the rules of the Senate, lies upon the table one day.

Mr. WHITE, from the select committee appointed to consider the subject of the letter of the Hon. JOHN RUGGLES, a Senator from the State of Maine, and the charges brought against him, made a report thereon, accompanied by sundry documents; the report concluding with a resolution, which the committee recommends to the Senate for its adoption; that there is no satisfactory evidence to sustain the charge made by Henry Jones against the Hon. JOHN RUGGLES, and that it is inexpedient for the Senate to entertain any further proceedings on the subject.

Mr. W. moved that the report and documents be printed; which was ordered.

Mr. GRUNDY said that although this matter was confined to a single individual, yet in his opinion, it was matter of public concern, and as the public would necessarily feel a more than usual interest in the case, he would move to print five hundred extra copies.

Mr. WHITE made some explanatory remarks, which could not be distinctly heard.

Mr. KING opposed the printing, on the ground of its being a private affair, and therefore unnecessary; besides which, the report being short, would sood find its way into all the newspapers of the day.

Mr. GRUNDY said that so far as he was concerned, he had the fullest confidence in the committee, and was perfectly satisfied with the correctness of that report, but there might be others who preferred to draw their own conclusions from the evidence, and hence it would be as well to give them an opportunity of indulging their wishes. Again, it was probable that the whole State which the subject of that report represented in part, might feel a deep interest in the subject; he therefore hoped the motion to print would prevail. The question on printing being taken, was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the bill giving the right of way to the Chicago and Galena Railroad Company, reported the same with an amendment, which was read.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Jabez L. White and Asa White; and

The bill for the relief of James Dutton.

The following bills were severally read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading:

The bill for the relief of Elias Johns;

The bill for the relief of Christopher Clarke;

The bill for the relief of Doctor Thomas Cooper, of South Carolina; and

The bill for the relief of Philip Marshall, and the legal representatives of John Marshall.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the graduation and reduction of the price of the public lands.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the following: And all lands which shall have been so offered for fifteen years, shall be subject to entry at one dollar per acre for the space of twelve months; and after that time, the same shall be subject to entry at seventy-five cents per acre for the space of twelve months, and after that time the same shall be subject to entry at fifty cents per acre. The effect of which is to leave the minimum at one dollar per acre for the space of one year for lands which shall have been in the market ten years prior to the 30th September, 1838; and after that time the minimum is to be 75 cents per acre.

Mr. TIPTON hoped the amendment would not prevail. If it did, he should care very little about the bill, as the State in which he lived was interested in the provision proposed to be stricken out more than any other.

Mr. HUBBARD suggested to the Senator from Indiana, that the provision which he wished to have stricken out, would have no operative effect for two years. If it was stricken out he would vote for the bill; but if not, as much as he was in favor of the principle of reduction, he must vote against it.

Mr. TIPTON said he should like to have the gentleman's vote, but was unwilling to pay so dear for it.

The question was then taken on Mr. HUBBARD'S motion, and it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the engrossment of the bill, Messrs. WALKER and BENTON severally addressed the Senate at length in its favor, and in reply to Mr. CLAY'S speech of yesterday; after which,

Mr. CRITTENDEN spoke briefly in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TIPTON then offered an amendment, providing that no person shall enter more than one quarter section of land under the provisions of this bill.

A debate then ensued, in which Mr. TIPTON supported the amendment, and Messrs. WALKER, SEVIER, ROBINSON, KING, and BENTON, opposed it; when

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the amendment by striking out "one quarter section," and inserting "one section;" which motion was adopted—ayes 18, noes 14.

Mr. W. moved further to amend the amendment by inserting as follows: "Provided, also, That no one shall be prohibited from entering any quantity, as herefore, of lands embraced in this act, at the price of one dollar and a quarter per acre."

Mr. TIPTON having accepted this as a modification of his amendment, the question was taken on the amendment, as amended, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Walker, Wall, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Trotter, White, and Young—14.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 21, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith of Connecticut, Swift, Wall, and Williams—16.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, April 13, 1838.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. ATHERTON, on leave, presented a memorial from the inhabitants of the town of Antrim, in the county of Hillsborough, State of New Hampshire, which town contains three hundred and seventeen legal voters, praying, agreeably to an unanimous vote of a full meeting of the citizens of said town, for the passage of a law to suppress the practice of duelling.

Mr. DARLINGTON asked leave to present a similar memorial.

Mr. MAXWELL of New Jersey objected.

Mr. DARLINGTON moved a suspension of the rule, whereupon Mr. M. withdrew his objection, and the memorial was presented; and, together with the preceding one, referred to the select committee having the subject under investigation.

TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill supplementary to the act authorizing the issuing of Treasury notes.

The bill was in the following words:

A BILL supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause Treasury notes to be issued according to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes," approved the 12th day of October last, in place of such notes as have been issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated, for the information of the House, that almost the whole revenue was unavailable, as it was now paid in the Treasury notes authorized by the act of October last. As the appropriation bills created at this time heavy drafts upon the Treasury, it was obviously necessary to authorize the Secretary to replace the notes so paid in and cancelled, by others to an equal amount. He should ask the House, during the next week, to consider this bill, as it was indispensably necessary to continue the operations of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland begged to inquire if any additional issue was proposed by this bill?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied in the negative.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio then renewed the application made by him yesterday to extend the special order till next Friday, in order to progress with such private bills as would not elicit debate; and, after a few words from Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, Mr. CRAIG of Virginia, and Mr. CAMBRELENG, the first of the motion, to extend the special order, was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the second branch of the motion,

Mr. THOMAS suggested the taking up the resolution submitted by him some time since, to amend the rules so as, on the first Friday of each month, to call over the private calendar, and act on such bills as would not elicit debate; but it was objected to.

After some remarks from Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, YELL, and THOMPSON, in opposition to the original motion,

Mr. HAMER suggested a modification, that the House first act on those which would not elicit debate, and Mr. WHITTLESEY having so modified the order, it was agreed to—ayes 101, noes 46.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Snyder.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of sundry estimates for buildings at West Point, and they were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill, without amendment, for the relief of George Davenport.

Mr. BOON, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Wm. S. L. Dering; which was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BOULDIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, made an unfavorable report on the case of William Graham.

Mr. HUNTER of Virginia asked the consent of the House to take up the bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown. [The bill was merely to enable the institution to wind up its concerns, the charter expiring on the 4th of July next; and the extension was for one year.]

The motion was assented to; and after a few words in its support from Mr. BOULDIN, the House went into Committee on said bill, Mr. HOPKINS in the Chair; and

After some remarks from Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. HUNTER,

Mr. FILLMORE moved to extend the time to 1845, for which the trustee or trustees would be liable for any debts due; which was agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported the bill, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau.

Mr. TALIAFERRO from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of the late Captain John A. Hopper, deceased.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill to authorize the issuing of land patents to the heirs of Francis Rivaud.

Mr. GRENNELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported without amendment Senate bill for the relief of Anne S. Heilman.

Mr. G. also reported without amendment Senate bill for the relief of Mary A. Patrick.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported with an amendment Senate bill granting half pay and pensions to widows of certain officers.

Mr. SIBLEY, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Phœbe Weeks.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported, with sundry amendments, Senate bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing land districts in the United States, the receipts from which do not authorize their longer continuance.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting returns of exports, imports, manufactures, &c. in the States and Territories during the commercial year up to September last.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting statements of all contracts, other than the regular contracts, and for the express mail, during the past year.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS laid on the table.

PRIVATE ORDERS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ATHERTON in the chair, and took up and considered the following bills, those giving rise to debate being passed over, and most of the others being informally considered, to be discussed in the House:

1. Bill for the relief of Patrick Green.
2. Bill for the relief of John Hollinsworth.
3. Bill for the relief of William James Aarons.
4. Bill for the relief of William Walker.
5. Bill for the relief of James A. Williams.
6. Bill for the relief of Abraham Woodall.
7. Bill for the relief of Nathan, Peter, and William Adams, deceased.
8. Bill for the relief of the administrator of Wharton Quarles, deceased.
9. Bill for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Thomas Carter.
10. Bill for the relief of Crawford Johnston.

A large number of bills having been objected to and laid aside on the ground of embracing payment for interest, Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, Mr. CUSHMAN of New Hampshire, and others objecting, and several ineffectual attempts for the committee to rise and rescind the restrictive order of this morning—

Mr. WISE declared that he should object to all the other bills.

A motion was then made for the committee to rise, but no quorum voting, the committee rose, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and the Chairman [Mr. ATHERTON] reported that fact to the House.

Mr. ADAMS then moved a call of the House, when a quorum appearing, the House again went into committee.

Mr. EWING then moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair,

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio moved that the order adopted this morning, for the exclusion of bills giving rise to debate, be rescinded.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, as well as the motion for a call.

Mr. A. expressed a wish to have the motion laid on the journal, and gave notice that he should renew the motion to-day, every time it was in order.

Mr. WISE, in pursuance of that notice, he said, moved an adjournment.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, as was the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed his motion for a call of the House, and for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Mr. A. explained his object to be to get a quorum to do business, for it was discreditable to the House that they could not keep a quorum together to do the business of the nation.

Mr. WISE then renewed the motion to adjourn: lost.

The question was then taken on a call of the House, and decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 98.

The special order was then rescinded without a division, and the House again went into committee, Mr. LYON in the Chair.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Nourse, and the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Goddard and others were severally passed over.

The "bill for the relief of John Hollinsworth" was again taken up, and discussed at some length by Mr. BOND in opposition, and by Mr. CHAPMAN and Mr. POPE in its support, when, on taking the question of reporting the bill to the House, without amendment, the vote was ayes 54, noes 23, no quorum, the committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in till 140 members had answered to their names, when the doors were closed.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the names of the absentees be recorded on the journal.

The CHAIR stated that, under the rule, this was always done.

Mr. CHAPMAN moved that the further proceedings of the call be dispensed with.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the House should now dispense, whether the names of the absentees would go on the journal.

The CHAIR replied that the list of absentees, up to the stage of the proceedings when the doors were closed, always went on the journal.

The roll was again called over, and excuses rendered for a number of gentlemen, pending which, ineffectual efforts were made to dispense with the call by Mr. MORGAN, Mr. WISE, and Mr. CAMPBELL; when, after the roll had been again gone through,

Mr. DROMGOOLE renewed the motion, and it prevailed—ayes 98—noes not counted; and then,

On motion of Mr. DAWSON,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, April 13, 1838.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Post Office Department, containing a statement of all land and water mails established within the year preceding 1st July, 1837, and other than annual lettings and express mails; made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, it was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKEAN presented eight memorials, of similar purport, signed by 867 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the alleged treaty of New Echota, made with the Cherokee nation of Indians, may not be enforced contrary to the wishes of the tribe: laid on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented several memorials, signed by 1100 or 1200 citizens of Pennsylvania, on the same subject; and a memorial from the citizens of Lancaster co. Pa. on the subject of duelling; which were also laid on the table.

Mr. MOUTON presented the petition of Robert McCausland and the legal representatives of Mark McCausland; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of Samuel Hilton, of the District of Columbia, praying remuneration for property destroyed during the last war: referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. R. also presented the petition of Richard Pool, praying remuneration for services during the last war: referred to the same committee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of the heirs of Richard K. Meade; which was referred to the Committe on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the widow of John L. Van Brun; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Thomas Cooper.

The bill for the relief of Philip Marshall, and the legal representatives of John Marshall.

The bill for the relief of Christopher Clark; and

The bill for the relief of Elias Johns.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands was read the third time; when

Mr. CALHOUN said, as the bill was now on its passage, he was desirous of stating, in a few words, the reasons which would govern him.

The bill was certainly liable but to little objection as to the details; but he could not give it his support. He felt satisfied that we had arrived at the period when one of two courses of policy ought to be pursued in relation to the publi lands—either to adhere rigidly to the laws, as they now stand, without making any material change, or to make a cession of them to the new States within whose limits they are respectively situated, on terms mutually satisfactory. It cannot be disguised, that the extent of interest involved in the public domain is too great, and the parties interested too powerful and influential, to permit the laws which regulate and dispose of the public lands to be the subject of frequent changes. Numerous and populous as those States have now become, (at which he rejoiced,) it was impossible to prevent this mighty stake from being thrown into the party struggles of the day, and from having a most pernicious effect on our politics, so long as they are under our control, unless we should abstain altogether from touching them, which he found was impossible.

It was well known that, under this impression, he was in favor of ceding them to the States, as the only practicable remedy against the evil he apprehended, and that under it he had introduced a bill to cede them. He hoped that the Committee on Public Lands would call up the bill at an early day. He was prepared to give it his best aid; and he did hope it would receive the sanction of the Senate. In the mean time, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against all measures which provided for any material change in the land laws, as they now stood.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had intended, yesterday, to have stated, in a brief manner, his objections to the passage of this bill, but was prevented by the lateness of the hour. He should avail himself to-day of the opportunity to perform this duty, because he chose to place his vote on grounds somewhat peculiar to himself, and which he deemed firm and tenable.

Mr. B. had, upon former occasions, always opposed the graduating principle contained in this bill; but he admitted that this was no conclusive reason why he should always continue to oppose it. We had recently heard much upon this floor on the subject of consistency. For his own part, he was far from considering it, in all cases, to be a political virtue. To assume that a man has never had reason to change his opinion, was to suppose that he had been at first a pure emanation of wisdom, springing perfect like Minerva from the head of Jove. All the lights of experience, all the vast improvements of the present age, were lost upon such an unchangeable being. He [Mr. B.] laid no claim to such infallibility, and when his opinions upon any subject had really changed, he trusted he should always have the manliness to make the avowal. He had accordingly re-examined and reconsidered the question of graduation, and that, too, not without a desire to unite with his Western friends; but he yet remained unconvinced.

What had been the operation of our present land system at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre? The best lands had always been entered the first at that price; whilst their settlement and improvement had given additional value to those which remained of an inferior quality. These inferior lands in succession had come into demand, and had been sold at the same rate. The country had thus been gradually settled and improved; and lands of a second and third rate quality had thus become a better bargain to the purchasers, at the minimum price, than the first rate lands originally were.

He admitted that, in all the new States, unless Illinois might be an exception, large bodies of refuse land would finally remain unsold, possessing little or no intrinsic value. When it shall have been clearly ascertained that any State of the Union was in this condition, he should be willing to cede these refuse lands to it upon the most liberal terms. It would be unjust to such a State forever to prevent its settlement and improvement, by holding its barren lands at a price which they could never command in competition with lands in other States of a quality greatly superior. He believed that the State of Mississippi contained a large proportion of this barren land. In the peculiar cases to which he had referred, he should most cheerfully vote for a graduating bill in favor of actual settlers.

If the benefits of the present bill had been confined to actual settlers in limited quantities, and had, in this respect, pursued the policy of the bill which passed the Senate during the last regular session, he should long have hesitated before he would have recorded his vote against it. He should, to some extent, have overstepped the limits of his own judgment in order to favor this class of purchasers. He had ever thought that the man who first went into the wilderness, and cleared away the forest to enable him to provide a home for himself and his family, had peculiar claims upon the favorable consideration of the Government. Such hardy and industrious men were the strength and the glory of any country, and in the day of danger would prove themselves to be its best defence. They reared a manly and independent offspring, on whom the Republic might rely in the time of its utmost need. His colleague [Mr. McKEAN] would bear him witness that the first political difficulty in which he had ever involved himself, when a very young man in the State Legislature, was in the cause of the actual settlers. [Here Gen. McKEAN nodded his assent.] On this question he had never changed his opinion.

Again: He had ever regarded the settlement and improvement of the new States with favor; and these States, especially such of them as lay west of the Mississippi, now had peculiar claims upon our regard. It had been our policy to remove from the States east of that river, to the frontier of these far western States, immense bands of warlike, restless, and discontented savages. There they were embodied, and these States must sustain the first shock of savage war. Had this bill held out any reasonable encouragement to actual settlers on this remote frontier, and thus created a barrier against the incursions of these savages, such a provision would have found favor in his eyes. We were bound by every principle of duty and honor to defend this frontier; and the cheapest and best mode of defence would be to people it with a brave and hardy race of men.

He could see nothing in this bill which held out any of these advantages. On the contrary, it appeared to him to be a measure which would encourage speculation, and retard, rather than advance, the actual settlement of the new States. It might be presumption in him to differ so widely from his Western friends on the present occasion; but he must express the honest dictates of his own judgment. What was the nature of this bill? It provided that, after the last day of the present year, all the public lands of the United States which shall then have been subject to entry for five years, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, should be reduced in price to one dollar per acre; and all these lands which shall then have been subject to entry for ten years, shall be reduced in price to one dollar per acre during one year thereafter, and after that period, to seventy-five cents per acre. The bill, as it originally stood before the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] was adopted, reduced the price of such lands as had been subject to entry for fifteen years to fifty cents per acre. There was but one limitation in the bill, and that was, that no individual should be authorized to purchase more than one section. How vain and illusory this limitation would prove in practice, every person who had the least experience in such matters would be able to decide. If a speculator wished to purchase fifty or one hundred sections, he had nothing to do but employ as many individuals to enter the land in their own names, pay for it, receive the patents, and convey the title either to himself or to any other person under his direction.

This bill would not only operate directly upon upwards of seventy millions of acres, but it established a precedent which would most certainly be pursued in regard to all the vast domain which shall hereafter be brought into market. What was that principle? That the price of all lands hereafter, which shall have been subject to private entry for five years, shall be reduced to one dollar per acre; and that which has been thus subject for ten years, shall be reduced to seventy-five cents per acre. We well know the intellectual and moral power of the West. They were a people who never put their hands to the plough and then looked back. Onward, onward! was their motto. We had been most significantly told by his friend from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] that the Senators from the new States ought not to be discouraged because the fifty cent minimum had been stricken from the bill, and that their power after the next census would be greatly increased. In his own language, "it is the first step which costs." Should this bill pass, there will ere long be a third graduated minimum, fixed at fifty cents per acre.

What would then be the consequence? The surveys of our public lands would be hastened. Vast quantities of them, far beyond the demand of purchasers, would be thrown into market. Five years thereafter, their price would be reduced to one dollar per acre; in ten years, it would be reduced to seventy-five cents; and in fifteen, to fifty cents. This graduating measure would, in effect, reduce the price of, by far, the greatest proportion of the public lands to seventy-five cents per acre; and ere long, should it pass, they would be reduced to fifty cents.

And what benefits would the new States derive from this reduction of price and this sacrifice of the public domain? It was, beyond doubt, their true policy to promote, not merely the sale, but the actual settlement, of the lands within their limits. It was an honest, industrious, and enterprising population which they wanted, and all their efforts ought to be directed to that object. None could more effectually arrest the policy than to have large bodies of their lands purchased and held, on speculation, by wealthy individuals and incorporated companies. This was one of the greatest curses which could befal any State. We had known something of it in one of the fairest portions of Pennsylvania, the settlement of which had been long delayed from this very cause. Would not this bill promote such speculations? If the spirit of speculation had raged to such an extent when the price was $1 25 per acre, that Western gentlemen themselves had become alarmed for the consequences, and had used all their efforts at the last regular session to confine the sales of land to actual settlers, what would be its fury on the return of prosperity, when these lands shall be reduced in price to seventy-five or fifty cents per acre? Large bodies of them would be monopolized; they would be held by individuals and companies; and the actual settler, instead of purchasing from the Government at a low price, would be compelled to pay a heavy profit to these speculators. He hoped he might be mistaken in his anticipations.

But how would this bill immediately and directly operate upon the settlement of the new States? Would it not retard, instead of accelerating, the increase of their population? Did it not on its face hold out a premium to delay the settlement of the country? What settler would pay a dollar and a quarter per acre for his land, when he knew that, by waiting a year or two, he could procure it for one dollar or seventy-five cents, or fifty cents? This was the natural tendency of the system; and it would be its inevitable effect. It was just the reverse of what it ought to be to accomplish the object. If you desired to promote the actual settlement of the new States, then reduce the price during a limited period in favor of actual settlers, and at the end of this period let it rise to its former standard. This would be offering a premium in favor of speedy settlement, whilst, on the contrary, the bill offered a premium for delay.

He again repeated, let the Western gentlemen introduce any reasonable measure to encourage the settlement of the new States, which should be confined to those who would actually cultivate the soil, and live and labor and die upon it, and which would not open wide the door for speculation and monopoly, and such a measure should receive his hearty and cordial support. He should never vote for any bill, however, which he believed would keep money out of the public Treasury, for the purpose of putting it into the pockets of speculators. They already derived sufficient profit from purchasing the public domain at $1 25 per acre; and if there must be a graduation in the price, let it be in favor of those, and those alone, who would till the soil.

There was one reason which would prevent him from voting for this bill at the present moment, even if none other existed. If any plan could be devised by which the just rights of the old States in the public lands could be secured, and at the same time the management and sale of them entrusted to the new States respectively, within whose limits they were situated, he should feel inclined to favor such a proposition. It would be most desirable to free the General Government from the power and the patronage of the present extended and complicated land system, and transfer it to the States, allowing them a liberal per centage on the sales, to indemnify them for their expense and trouble. Their pecuniary interest would then harmonise with that of the people of the old States, and we should not hear so much upon the subject of reducing the price of the public land. Besides, it would relieve them from that condition of dependence upon the General Government of which they so much complain. He knew the arrangement of any such system would be attended with great difficulties; still the attempt ought to be, and he understood would be, made. He merely glanced at this point for the present.

The question was then taken, and the bill was passed—yeas 27, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Wall, and Williams—16.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of defining and limiting the term of all bureau officers connected with the departments, and of all appointments made by the heads of departments.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a system of telegraphs for the United States, and to report thereon.

The resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. NORVELL having been called up,

Mr. NORVELL said, after examining the laws and the rule in relation to the subject, he would beg leave to offer the following as a modification:

Resolved, That in the settlement and payment of the compensation allowed by law to the members of the Senate, the per diem allowance shall be deducted for the number of days any Senator may hereafter absent himself from the service of the Senate, unless detained from his seat by sickness; and that the proper officer of the Senate certify the compensation due to Senators, in conformity to this resolution, and to the statement of each Senator, in writing, at the close of the session, upon the subject.

Mr. LINN desired to know how the Senator meant to ascertain the sickness or indisposition of Senators: what was to be the test in relation to it?

Mr. KING said, during his public life he had never lost more than two days save from sickness. He was not prepared to vote, however, for the resolution. The law in relation to the subject was imperative in itself; and if they were governed by the law, what could they gain by the resolution? If the law was insufficient, could we expect the resolution to effect what the law could not? Besides, it implied a censure upon individuals. Senators, as honorable men, were bound, in settling their accounts, to make a deduction for the number of days they were absent, and it was presumed they would do so; but how was the Secretary to ascertain the absence of any Senator unless upon his own admission? The Senator might be at the Departments attending to his public duties, or he may have stepped into a committee room on matters connected with his Senatorial duties. And was he then to be considered absent? Mr. K. thought the Senator from Michigan, on reflection, would withdraw his resolution. He [Mr. K.] had no doubt but the Senator was actuated by the most laudable motives in introducing it; but as he deemed the law and the rule ample in themselves, he would feel bound to oppose the resolution even as modified.

Mr. NORVELL said he was actuated by no other motive, in offering the resolution, than to insure by it a prompt attendance at the Senate chamber, for the despatch of the public business. This resolution, if adopted, would have a tendency to enforce the laws, and all he desired was a simple vote on the subject, and on which he should ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE said all who witnessed his career in public life would bear him out in the assertion, that he was neither inattentive to his public duties, or negligent in his attendance, either in the committee rooms, or the Senate chamber; but he must object to the resolution from a reason different from any that he had yet heard assigned. That document seemed to take for granted that a Senator has the right to be absent, provided he relinquished his pay for that time. Now, this was a doctrine which he never could admit. It was presumed, when we were sent here, that we were at least worthy of our seats, and he should so act as to show that the confidence inspired in us was not misplaced, which would certainly be the case, if we chose to neglect our public duties when we pleased, on surrendering the per diem. He thought it as much a matter of duty for him to stay and vote, as he did to vote right, according to the dictates of his conscience. If a Senator staid away to the prejudice of the public business, we had a right to send after him, and compel his attendance whether willing or not. Mr. W. would oppose the resolution, therefore, on the ground that it implied the right to be absent when payment was surrendered, a doctrine directly at variance with the usefulness of all legislative bodies.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he could not vote for the resolution for another reason; and that was, that absence from the Senate implied neglect of public duties, which he was by no means willing to admit. He would undertake to say that he did infinitely more in his room than he did in the Senate chamber; for he was at work there night and day, either reading, digesting, or preparing matters connected with his public duties. This was the 32d year since his entrance into public life; and in all that period, he had lost less time from the public business, either by sickness, or from any other cause, than any man so long engaged in public life. In December, 1832, Mr. C. said he was absent; but it was while a highly important measure was to be brought about, in the prosecution of which he was as much engaged as though he had been present in the Senate chamber. To presume a Senator, because not in his place, to be inattentive to his public duties, was what he could not admit; and he would go further, and say that the public business would be often expedited by attending more at home, or in the committee rooms. Besides, did not the Senator from Michigan see, under his resolution, that if a Senator was absent from any cause connected with his public duties, that the little, miserable pittance of pay was withheld; and did he not also see that if persons were so disposed, that this miserable modicum of money would have no influence in restraining him? He hoped the Senator would withdraw his resolution, or suffer it to lie on the table.

Mr. NORVELL said, the doctrines held forth by some of the Senators would go towards dispensing with all law and rule whatever. Because the Senate was an honorable and respectable body, was it to be taken for granted that its members could not err in absenting themselves? Had we not often seen the public business delayed for want of a quorum, or bills defeated from non-attendance of members? All he would say further was, that he could not justify himself to his constituents on such pleas. As there appeared so many, however, opposed to the measure, he would withdraw it.

The resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to authorize the selection of a section of land as therein named, and a bill to confirm certain purchases of public lands under the act of the 19th June, 1834; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, April 14, 1838.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, Mr. SMITH of Maine had leave of absence from the service of the House from and after the first of May next.

THE LATE DUEL.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, on leave, presented sundry petitions on the subject of the late duel.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Hampshire presented a petition of Caleb Rix and others, for the expulsion of those engaged in the late duel.

Mr. PECK of New York also presented petitions on the same subject.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill supplementary to the act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier, approved 30th June, 1834.

Mr. EVERETT, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to law before this House a statement of the amount paid, and the amount of arrears, on account of the expenses of the Seminole war, and an estimate of the sum necessary, in addition to former appropriations, to pay such arrears, and carry on said war until the first day of June next.

Mr. E. asked for the consideration of the resolution at this time, but Mr. PETRIKIN objecting, Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rule, but the House refused, only 69 voting in the affirmative, so the resolution lies over, under the rule.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the propriety of establishing a mail route from Washington, in Georgia, by the way of Ray Town and Powellton, to Sparta, in said State.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making a port of entry at Memphis, in the State of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. LYON, the map accompanying the report of Gen. Gaines on the defence of the Western frontier, was ordered to be lithographed.

Mr. FRY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported the following, viz:

1. Bill granting a pension to Helen Miller of New York.

2. Bill granting a pension to Thornton Cornell of Rhode Island.

Mr. MORGAN, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports in the cases of David Kronklute, William Neel, and Roger Halcomb.

DIVORCE OF THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PRESS

Mr. BOND then resumed, and concluded his remarks in support of the resolution of Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, to disconnect the public press from the patronage of the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS gave notice that, on Monday next, he should move the consideration of Mr. HAMER's resolution, and hoped there would be a full attendance of the House.

The House then passed to the orders of the day, and bills of the Senate were read twice and referred.

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, was read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE ORDERS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LYON in the Chair, on the bills on the private calendar, and considered the following bills:

1. The bill for the relief of Jehu Hollinsworth: [amended.]

2. Bill for the relief of William James Androus: [amended.]

3. Bill for the relief of Joel Chandler: [amended.]

4. Bill for the relief of James A. Williams, [amended.]

5. Bill for the relief of Abraham Woodall: [amended.]

6. Bill for the relief of Patrick Green.

7. Bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Dr. Philip Turner, deceased.

This was a case of the allowance of interest upon commutation pay which had, in the first instance, been rejected by the accounting officer, but subsequently allowed by Congress. On this ground the interest was claimed.

The bill was opposed by Mr. ALLEN of Vermont, and supported by Messrs. CRAIG, TALIAFERRO, and UNDERWOOD; when

Mr. ALLEN moved to strike out the enacting clause, which was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 61.

8. Bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Dr. Absalom Baird, deceased.

Mr. ALLEN also moved to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, which was agreed to without a division.

9. Bill for the relief of Robert Wilmot. [Same motion prevailed.]

10. Bill for the relief of the heirs of Nathan, Peter, and William Adams, deceased.

The committee then rose and reported.

The last bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

The amendments to bills Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 were all severally concurred in, and ordered to a third reading.

Before taking the question on the other bills,

On motion of Mr. TALIAFERRO,

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, April 16, 1838.

As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. HAMER rose, and asked leave to make a statement to the House, to which no objection was made.

Mr. H. then said that he had been requested to state whether he intended again to offer the resolution presented by him on Monday last. In regard to that matter he begged to advert to what had been thrown out elsewhere. He understood from the newspapers that various opinions were entertained as to the object he had in view. By some it was suggested that it had been offered as a sort of antagonist proposition to Mr. Biddle's letter. Now, it would be recollected that Mr. H. presented his resolution on Saturday, and Mr. Biddle's letter was only printed on the same day in Philadelphia. He himself did not hear of it till Sunday night, nor see it till Monday morning, and could necessarily, therefore, have no knowledge of it on Saturday.

Another suggestion had been thrown out, that Mr. H. had offered it with reference to the charter election in the city of New York. However important that election might be in itself, or however important some gentlemen might deem it, he trusted he had higher objects in view than the New York city or any other election. He looked to the great interests of the country, and to them alone.

Mr. H's object was simply this: He knew that the Bank Convention was to assemble on Wednesday last, and he had reason to believe that many gentlemen who had gone as delegates thereto entertained an apprehension that the course of the General Government, the legislation of Congress, as well as the action of the Treasury Department in carrying out that legislation, might be hostile to the resumption of specie payments. For himself, he did not believe that the Congress of the United States would pass any law, at the present session, without having special reference to the existing condition of the country, or that it would not so modify any law it might pass as to throw no hindrance in the way of resumption.

Neither did Mr. H. believe that the Treasury Department, in carrying out that legislation, did feel or would feel any disposition to throw any impediment in the way of effecting that resumption. His object, therefore, was to give such assurances to those banks which had gone into convention, as might encourage them to go on, for it was surely desired by every patriotic man in the country, of every party, that the banks should resume.

Again: the House refused to entertain the proposition on Monday; and when he was called upon, two days afterwards, to give an explanation, he was refused, and he was not disposed to put himself in the attitude of impeding the business of the House by moving, day after day, to suspend the rules.

Besides, he found that, by moving this proposition, he placed a number of his political friends in this embarrassing condition: that, although they did not disapprove of the principle involved in it, or the object sought to be attained by it, still some of them did not approve of its phraseology, and therefore they were compelled to vote against it. Many were actuated by another feeling. They feared a premature discussion on the whole currency question, which would inevitably spring up, and amendments of the resolution, which might compel them and himself to vote against a proposition, the general tenor of which, in its present shape, they approved. He understood amendments were to be offered on both sides of the House. In voting against the suspension of the rules, therefore, they would be placed in the embarrassing attitude of seeming to oppose his resolution.

Mr. BELL here interposed, and said he begged to know if it was in order to discuss these questions now.

The CHAIR remarked that the gentleman was proceeding under the unanimous assent of the House for him to make a statement.

Mr. BELL so understood it, but then the gentleman was making an argument which was to go forth to the country, and Mr. B. wanted to know if any reply would be permitted, for the gentleman was certainly exceeding his privilege. Mr. B. would, however, ask him to explain to them and the country what was the mode of relief he proposed to give to the State banks, or whether he sought only to put forth an intention to relieve them without adopting any thing specific? He asked the gentleman—

The CHAIR interposed, and reminded Mr. BELL that if the House accorded its unanimous assent to one gentleman to make a statement, a debate could not go, unless the House again assented. [Cries of "go on!" "go on!"]

Mr. HAMER had but a few words more to say. Since he had offered the resolution, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury had come out, containing, substantially, the same declaration; and, in addition to that, the official organ of the Government (the Globe) had given a similar assurance. In addition to that, also, the Bank Convention had probably decided by this time upon the course they would pursue.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky here interposed. He said he had understood the gentleman merely to ask leave to make an explanation in relation to his own attitude; but he was now explaining for his own political party, for the organ of the Administration, and for the Secretary of the Treasury. Now if the gentleman wanted to explain for himself, Mr. W. had no objection; but he should object to his going into explanations for his own political party.

The CHAIR stated that any restriction was now beyond the power of the House, and this was one of the consequences that often grew out of gentlemen giving their unanimous consent to make statements.

Mr. HAMER had said all he intended to say on the subject, and would only add his belief, in conclusion, that the time had passed by when the adoption of the resolution would have any material effect one or way or the other; and for these reasons he did not intend to renew it, and should not, therefore, present it to the House again.

Mr. MENIFEE rose, he said, merely to make one single remark. It was simply this—

A gentleman rose and objected.

Mr. MENIFEE moved a suspension of the rule to enable him to make his remark.

Mr. PECK called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 85 to 71 nays; which, not being two-thirds, decided the motion in the negative.

TEXAS.

Mr. SHIELDS, on leave, presented the following joint preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee:

Whereas we have been anxious and attentive observers of the progress of events in Texas, and have not been unmoved spectators of her late gallant and glorious struggle for freedom, and have seen that freedom achieved by those near and dear to us by the ties of kindred and common ancestry; and whereas we have seen, by a vote of the people of that Republic, an anxious desire manifested to become citizens of these United States; and whereas we believe that the gallant and chivalrous bravery of Texans in their struggle for liberty and free government, is an assurance of their worth, and sufficient evidence of their qualification, to entitle them to brotherhood and citizenship with us; and whereas, also, we believe that the annexation of Texas to these United States is a consummation devoutly to be wished, and an end worthy our best exertions to attain, if it can be done without an infraction of the law of nations, or a departure from the policy or principles of this Government:

Now, therefore, Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we desire most anxiously that Texas be acquired by these United States; and

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be informed of our desire to acquire the territory of Texas, and to annex it to the United States by treaty or purchase, and at such time as they may deem most expedient.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and these resolutions be forwarded by the Governor of this State to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request that they introduce them to the consideration of both branches of Congress.

JOHN COCKE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
TERRY H. CAHAL,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed Jan. 20, 1838.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their utmost exertions to procure the passage of a law making an appropriation to pay such of the Tennessee Volunteers as organized under the several calls made in 1836, and were not received into the service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to forward to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions. (Signed as the former resolutions.)

The latter resolution was referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. SHIELDS then moved to refer the other, ogether with all other papers heretofore presented on the subject of the annexation of Texas, to a select committee.

Mr. BRONSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. SHIEDDS asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 75.

So the subject was laid on the table.

Petitions and memorials having been called for in the order of Territories and States, were presented as follows:

Mr. PRATT moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. WISE, with a view, he said, to see if the House was disposed to consider the subject at all, asked for the yeas and nays. Mr. W. added that the Legislature of Maryland had signified its assent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Only one branch of it.

The question was then taken on laying on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 73.

Mr. WISE then gave notice, that if a favorable attempt could not be made, and that in a few years, to recede this District, he would go with the gentlemen from the West, freely and most cheerfully, to move the seat of Government.]

MARYLAND.

Messrs. HOWARD, PEARCE, THOMAS, and WORTHINGTON.

Mr. THOMAS, with the leave of the House, said that he had seen this morning, in the published journal of the House, that leave of absence had been given to a member from Maine from and after the first day of May next. He desired to have an opportunity to record his vote against such a precedent in our proceedings. This he could not have, unless some member, who was present when this leave was granted, would do him a favor, and move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. LINN presented the petition of Gilbert Knappe, praying compensation for services as inspector of customs, &c. referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FULTON presented a resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking the passage of a law of Congress to authorize a sale of the sixteenth section of land in Chicot county, in that State: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the petitions of Richard Poole and Samuel Hilton, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the same; which was concurred in.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Bazil Brown, for horses sold to a certain tribe of Indians. Mr. W. said that the committee had no doubt of the honesty of the claim, so far as to the horses being actually delivered to the Indians; but the commissioner in the case, who was authorized to negotiate the treaty, was expressly directed to make no admissions of debts. Also, to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mr. Beck, for guns furnished some Indians: concurred in.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Philip Barbour, deceased; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committe on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Peoria, in the State of Illinois, by way of Oceola, Thermopylæ, and Wapello, to Galena, and also from Oquauska, on the Mississippi river, by way of Monmouth, Knoxville, La Fayette, Oceola, Providence, and Windsor, to Enterprise, at the termination of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, in said State.

Mr. KING said he rose with a view to introduce a resolution, calling the attention of Congress to the time when the labors of the session ought to be brought to a close. He knew by experience, said Mr. K. that unless a day be fixed, the public business is often procrastinated, and time wasted in unprofitable discussion, which ought to be more profitably employed. More was done in one week after the period of adjournment was known, than in the lapse of three, where it was not. With a view, then, to call the attention of Congress to this subject, he had prepared a resolution fixing the period for the first Monday in June next, which would be the fourth of that month. Mr. K. said he would let it lie on the table for the present, in order that Senators might consult together in relation to it; but avowed his determination to call it up at some reasonable day, with a view to decisive action upon it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives do adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, the 4th day of June next.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act for the relief of James McMahon.

An act for the relief of Curtis Grubb.

An act for the relief of Alexander C. Morgan.

An act for the relief of Jonathan Elliot.

An act for the relief of John Wilson.

An act for the relief of Thomas Tyner and others.

An act for the relief of James L. Kenner.

An act for the relief of H. W. Russel.

An act for the relief of Freeman Brady.

An act for the relief of James Callan.

An act for the relief of D. W. Healey.

An act for the relief of Ann W. Johnson.

An act for the relief of Winthrop Sears.

A bill to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company certain duties paid upon railroad iron.

A bill to refund certain duties upon railroad iron, paid by the New York and Harlem Railroad Company.

A bill for the relief of Thomas Sumpter.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Patrick McGibbony.

A bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone.

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert White.

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis L. B. Goodwin.

A bill for the relief of Michael Ambrister.

A bill for the relief of William Cogswell.

A bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Capt. John Fulford.

The bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

The bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities, of corporations created by acts of Congress, which have expired, being taken up—

Mr. GRUNDY rose and addressed the Senate until 4 o'clock; when,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and soon after Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, April 17, 1838.

After the reading of the Journal,

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, remarked, that having yesterday, under a misapprehension of the question, voted against the consideration of a resolution offered by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS,] he would, if in order, move a reconsideration of that vote. Mr. C. would embrace the opportunity to state, that he made this motion from no apprehension that the Government would oppose unnecessary obstacles to the resumption of specie payments, or that it would not, within the limits of its constitutional powers, aid in the restoration of a sound and healthy curreney; but for the sole purpose of placing himself in a true position before his consituents upon a subject of great importance to the commercial prosperity of the country.

The SPEAKER observed that the motion would be entered.

Mr. SIBLEY, on leave, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to widow Phebe Harrington, of the county of Ontario, in the State of New York.

Mr. ADAMS, from a select committee, moved that the use of the Hall be granted on Wednesday and Thursday mornings, from 9 till 11 o'clock, to Professor Espy to deliver two lectures, but it being objected to, Mr. A. at the suggestion of the SPEAKER, waived the motion till the standing committees were called through.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio from the Committee of Claims, reported Senate bill, for the relief of Samuel Ferguson, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. BOON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, without amendment, Senate bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported Senate bill, giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain, with a recommendation that it do not pass; the consideration of which was postponed till Monday next.

Mr. COLES, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Francis Fowler.

Mr. YELL, on leave, laid on the table a proposed amendment he intended to offer to the bill in relation to the Western Frontier; which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGHAM, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported Senate bill, without amendment, to remunerate the captors of the privateer Lydia.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, from the Committe on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill, without amendment, to provide for the northeast boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783.

Mr. F. gave notice that he should call up the bill this day two weeks.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will proceed, on Friday next, after 12 o'clock, to consider bills reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and those which may be reported from that committee before that time.

Mr. T. stated that there were a number of bills reported from this committee two or three years ago, on which there would be no discussion, as none had been acted on or reached at the second session of the last Congress. He therefore hoped the House would give at least one day to these bills.

The motion, however, was disagreed to.

Mr. AYCRIGG, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Harrison.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an unfavorable report in the case of Jacob McGinnis; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER of Vermont, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill in addition to the act to promote the encouragement of the useful arts.

Mr. F. also made an adverse report against the petition of Thomas G. Coyle.

Mr. PEARCE moved its reference to a select committee.

Mr. RENCHER opposed this reference, on the ground that its proper jurisdiction was the committee which had reported against it.

Mr. PEARCE asked the chairman of the committee on what grounds they had reported against the petition.

Mr. FLETCHER replied, that on taking the subject under consideration, the committee deemed it one not coming within their province at all. The petition was not for a patent, but for an examination into the merits of a patent already granted to him for a water cement, and into the propriety of its being used by the Government in the public works. For this reason it was returned to the House.

The motion of Mr. PEARCE was agreed to, and the committee ordered to consist of five members.

Mr. FLETCHER, on leave, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, the Senate concurring therein, That the Commissioner of Patents have the privilege of taking books from the Library of Congress, for the use of his Department, under the rules and regulations that are prescribed to members of Congress.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed his motion to grant the use of the hall to-morrow and next day mornings, from 9 till 11 o'clock, to Professor Espy; the motion being made from a select committee on the subject of encouraging meteorological observations throughout the United States.

After some remarks from Messrs. CONNOR and WHITTLESEY of Ohio, in its support,

Mr. PICKENS moved to lay it on the table: lost.

The motion was further advocated by Mr. TILLINGHAST, when

Mr. McKENNAN moved the previous question; which was seconded, and ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the motion, but they were refused; and the motion was agreed to—ayes 99, noes not counted.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, from the select committee on the subject, reported a bill granting a bounty of land to such soldiers of the old Fourth regiment of infantry as served during any part of the war with Great Britain.

TREASURY BUILDING.

Mr. LINCOLN asked the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill reported by the Committee on the Public Buildings, to provide for removing the walls of the new Treasury building. He stated that there were between one and two hundred persons out of employment in consequence of the suspension of the work.

Mr. RENCHER objected to setting aside the regular business for particular objects.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, appealed to the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his objection, to which Mr. R. assented.

Mr. BOON renewed the objection.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a suspension of the rules, which was agreed to without a count, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. POPE in the Chair, and took up the following bill:

A BILL providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the unfinished walls of the Treasury building, now in the process of construction, to be taken down, and the materials to be removed and applied to the construction of a fire-proof building of such dimensions and upon such plan of arrangement as may be required for the use and accommodation of the Post Office Department, on the site of the Post Office building recently destroyed by fire; and, for this purpose, that he be authorized to appoint a skilful architect to prepare and submit to him the necessary plans for the proper construction of such building, having regard to the use of the materials aforesaid, which being approved by him, shall be conformed to in the erection of the structure. And the said architect may be continued in the superintendence of the construction of the building, or another employed in that service, as the President may judge best.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the erection of the building authorized by the first section of this act, in addition to the materials to be removed and applied thereto, as therein mentioned, there be, and hereby is, appropriated, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

Mr. LINCOLN went into a detailed statement on the subject, and gave some explanations in reference to the report of the committee lately published. Mr. L. addressed the committee at length on the whole subject.

Mr. CAMBRELENG thought the House should do nothing more at present than arrest the present building, and not make a new or additional appropriation, in the present condition of the Treasury, of $150,000, besides $140,000 of unexpended balance. He expressed a hope that, instead of going into the merits and controversies of different architects, the committee would rise, so that the House might progress with more important and pressing business.

Mr. THOMPSON was opposed to the rising of the committee, for he was anxious that this building should go on, so necessary and indispensable for the preservation of the public documents, records, and archives, of the Treasury Department. Mr. T. expressed his confidence in the architectural skill of Mr. Mills.

Mr. PICKENS regarded the whole question as one of critical taste or judgment, in which, perhaps, no two architects could be found to agree. Every architect had his own peculiar notions of taste; and, if this building were pulled down, and another site and plan selected, that might, in its turn, be condemned by some other fastidious critic. If the precedent involved in this bill should be adopted, there would be no end to it, and they might be continually pulling down, and even destroy, all the old buildings. No matter who might be the architect of a structure, he would bring a dozen to condemn it. He preferred the present plan going on; and referring to the buildings constructed by Mr. Mills in South Carolina, stated that he had great confidence in that gentleman.

In order to test the sense of the House in regard to the propriety of this measure, and to the principles embraced in the establishment of such a precedent, he moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BOON was in favor of continuing the building under the present architect, for he supposed the controversy originated mainly from another wanting the job. He had no expectation that this bill would pass; but if the motion to strike out the enacting clause should fail, he would move an amendment, the purport of which was, that the building authorized by this act should be erected in the city of Cincinnati or Louisville, preparatory to the removal of the seat of Government west of the mountains. This bill presented a fair opportunity for such a provision.

Mr. RENCHER opposed the bill on the ground that he preferred relying on the judgment of an architect of their own, rather than on that of one who was unknown to it, and had given an opinion under circumstances of opposition, having been called in to give an opinion against the proposed structure and condemn it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina was in favor of pulling down what was done, mainly for the reason that he would substitute a cheaper edifice, though he was of opinion that the weight of evidence, as to the stability of the proposed building, was against the Government architect.

Mr. YELL assented to the views of Mr. RENCHER, and was not disposed to throw away eighty or a hundred thousand dollars for pulling down this building, at a time, too, when appropriations were wanted for the necessities of the Government, such as the Florida war, &c. Mr. Y. proceeded, at some length, to oppose the bill, and argued with much warmth in favor of economy and retrenchment.

Mr. EVERETT supported the bill on the strength of the report of the committee, and the opinions of the architects who had condemned the building, and who had no prejudicial bias.

Mr. TALIAFERRO spoke in opposition to the bill, and especially to the policy of dispensing with the materials already collected, even if the site should be disapproved of, unless it was designed to construct a palace instead of a suitable house of business.

Mr. MERCER briefly advocated the bill, when, on motion of Mr. NAYLOR, the committee rose and reported; and,

On motion,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, April 17, 1838.

The CHAIR presented a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting an abstract prepared by the Comptroller of the Treasury, showing the official emoluments of certain officers of the customs: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee in favor of the annexation of Texas to the Union; and resolutions from the same, asking Congress to make provision for the payment of the troops of that State called into the service of the United States in the year 1832; the first of which were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed and the last were referred to the Commitee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRESTON, in reference to the first of these resolutions, gave notice that he should call up the subject connected with them at the earliest day possible.

Mr. ROBINSON presented the petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, for a new post route: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. TROTTER presented the petition of the legal representatives of J. B. D. De Verbois and F. De Verbois, praying for the confirmation of their two claims to lands in Mississippi: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. STRANGE presented the petition of Arthur Marthers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Angel and other heirs at law of Benjamin King, deceased, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. NORVELL, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of the heirs of David Allen, the widow of Miles Goforth, and the heirs of Thomas Lucas, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of John Elliot, Gilbert Knapp, and Joseph Orringer, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. FULTON, from the Joint Committee on the Public Buildings, laid before the Senate the report agreed on by the Senate and House committees, and which had already been presented to the House, accompanied by a bill for removing the walls of the Treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department. The bill was read and ordered to a second reading, and the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith was read the third time, and passed.

The following bills from the House were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

The bill for the relief of William James Aarons.

The bill for the relief of William Walker.

The bill for the relief of Joel Chandler.

The bill for the relief of James A. Williams.

The bill for the relief of Abraham Woodall.

The bill for the relief of Patrick Green.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities of corporations created by Congress, which have expired, having been taken up,

Mr. GRUNDY said he had no wish to hurry this bill; and, if no Senator wished to address the Senate on it, he had no objection to its postponement.

Mr. KING said that this was a very important bill, as shown by the very able speech of the Senator from Tennessee yesterday, in its favor. The Senate was not full, and he himself was not prepared to give his vote on it. He therefore wished the bill to be laid on the table, or pass it over till to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY said if the friends of the Administration desired to pass the bill over, he had no objection to it. He was really desirous of taking the vote on this bill, and wished to see whether a majority of the Senate was prepared to assert the power claimed by it.

Mr. LINN said if his friend from Alabama wished to address the Senate on the subject, he had no objection to a postponement, as he always heard him with pleasure. But if the gentleman had no such purpose, he hoped the question would be taken at once.

Mr. KING said he had no intention of speaking on this subject; but there were some provisions of this bill which he wished to have an opportunity of examining into more fully. If gentlemen wished te take the question now, he had no objections to their doing so; he only wished to say that, under his present impressions, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. STRANGE said the acts complained of, as set forth in the eloquent and able remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, were a gross and flagrant abuse, but he doubted the power of Congress to reach the subject; and should the question be insisted on, he should be compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. KING (in an under tone.) Exactly my case.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut hoped the bill would be permitted to lie over until to-morrow, in order that he might have time to examine a little further into its provisions. He did not feel himself prepared to vote at that time; in fact he had no idea, nor did he believe any other Senator conceived, the question would be taken to-day, or he might have been better prepared. He expressed a wish that it might lie over, intimating his intention to call it up to-morrow, if no one else would.

Mr. WALL was averse to delaying the bill. It had already been on the tables for more than a month, which he thought ample time for investigation. Mr. W. said, so far as he was concerned, he had not the slightest doubt of the constitutionality of the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said he did not know that he ought to ask a postponement, as it was his own fault that he had not examined it; but as he had not done so, and did not deem the question would be taken, he would prefer that it be delayed. Constitutional objections had been raised by Senators, in whose judgment he had every confidence; he was not disposed to record his vote until he had given the matter a full and impartial examination.

Mr. NILES also thought the bill too important not to undergo more discussion, and said there might be other Senators disposed to present their views. It was not improbable that he might present his own on the subject.

The bill was then laid on the table without a division.

The following bills were severally read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill to authorize the appointment of four additional clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The bill for the benefit of the Levy Court of Calvert county, Maryland;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of John Campbell;

The bill for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, directors of an asssociation called the New England Mississippi Land Company.

[Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate on the subject of this bill. He had always been opposed to it as originally reported; but as it was now amended, he was in favor of it.]

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present, they were accordingly ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, King, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Swift, Wall, Williams, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Strange, Tipton, White, and Wright—14.

The bill to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to issue a patent to Angier March Perkins and John Howard Kyan.

The bill for the relief of the children and heirs of William Fisher, deceased; and

The bill for the relief of Melancthon T. Woolsey.

The bill increasing the salaries of several of the district judges of the United States, was discussed by Messrs. SWIFT, WALL, RIVES, and PRENTISS, on a motion of Mr. SWIFT to amend the bill by increasing the salary of the judge for the district of Vermont; but before taking any question,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business; after which

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1838.

Mr. PECK asked leave to present a petition on the subject of the late duel, but it was object to.

Mr. NAYLOR asked leave to offer the resolution presented by him some days since, calling upon the President of the United States for the reasons why he had not before responded to a call for certain information on the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. INGHAM assured the House that the information called for would be sent in to-day or to-morrow.

Several objections being made—

Mr. NAYLOR moved a suspension of the rule, but the House refused without a division.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill relating to the tenure of office of subordinate officers of the customs.

Mr. C. moved that the bill be put on its passage, and made some explanations of the necessity of the measure; and after some remarks from Messrs. FILMORE, SMITH, HAYNES, ADAMS, and TOLAND,

Mr. CUSHMAN moved to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow; which was agreed to.

Mr. CORWIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with an amendment, Senate bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels impelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. STANLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin D. Townes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Va. from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Wm. Neves: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported against the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of John Grimball, on the ground that the relief prayed for can be obtained under an existing law of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked leave to offer the following preamble and resolutions, which were read:

WHEREAS, it was some years since declared to the people of the United States, by the illustrious Andrew Jackson, that reform and retrenchment in their Government and its expenditures were necessary: and whereas, the declaration of the late President, in relation to the promised reform and retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government, was not carried out by his friends in Congress: and whereas, instead of lessening the expenditures of the Government, they have been largely and enormously increased: and whereas, it is highly important to the people of the United States that their Government should be usefully administered upon as cheap a scale or price as is consistent with the public good:

Therefore, Resolved, That a select committee of nine members be appointed to take into consideration, and report to this House, what salaries of the officers of this Government may be reduced, what officers may be dispensed with, and what items of expenditures in the various officers or departments of this Government can be entirely or in part dispensed with; and, for the purpose of enabling the committee to make a correct report whether or not the expenses of the different Executive Departments of this Government have increased within the last ten years, and what salaries may be reduced, what officers may be dispensed with, and what items of expenditure may be lessened:

Therefore, resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, Navy, and the Postmaster General be, and they are respectively, required to report and communicate to this House, as soon as practicable, what were the expenses of their respective Departments, including every item of expenditure, in the year commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and ending on the 3d day of March, 1829, and so on for each successive year, up to the 4th day of March, 1838, placing each item of expenditure under its proper head.

Objection being made from several quarters,

Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKAY requested the gentleman to withdraw the preamble, and then he would vote for the resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS replied that he could, on no account, consent to do that.

Mr. CAMBRELENG wished to know if the House was again disposed to set aside all the public business of the nation, as it did yesterday, to consider this proposition.

Mr. McKAY inquired of the CHAIR if the question could not be taken on the preamble and resolutions separately?

The CHAIR replied that the question was not divisible, for a proposition could not be divided till it was before the House.

Mr. McKAY reiterated that he would willingly vote to suspend for the resolutions, but not for the preamble.

Mr. TILLINGHAST solicited the gentleman to withdraw one single word of the preamble.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not one word nor one letter.

The House refused to suspend the rules—yeas 92, nays 87.

DIVORCE OF THE PUBLIC PRESS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution submitted some time since by Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, to divorce the public press from the patronage of the Government.

Mr. DROOMGOLE moved to add the following to the resolution.

And that the said committee be also instructed to inquire whether the individual elected printer by this House, at the Extra session, does now execute, and has, in fact, since his election, executed the public printing at his own establishment, with the press, types, and hands employed in his own office, and subject to his immediate orders, directions, and control; or whether the public printing has not, since the period of said election, been executed, and whether it is not now executed, at the office of the political journal other than that of the printer to this House, and under the directions and regulations of other editors; and if so, to inquire upon what authority, and upon what terms, conditions, and stipulations, the public printing has been transferred to individuals other than the one appointed and required by this House to perform the same. And that the said committee inquire further, whether, prior to the final ballot, and before the close of said election of printer, there was not some bargain, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, inchoate or complete, that in the event of the election of the individual now holding the appointment, the public printing should be executed at the office of another political journal, whose editors were, at the same time, also candidates for the appointment; and that the committee report to this House, specially, the nature and the terms of any such bargain, agreement, or understanding.

And that the committee be also instructed to ascertain and state, under separate and specific heads, the various expenditures growing out of the action of the special committee of this House, appointed on the 3d day of January, 1837; and in like manner the various expenditures growing out of the action of the select committee of this House, appointed on the 17th day of January, 1837; and also the various expenditures growing out of the action of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of Richard S. Coxe and William L. Brent, presented to this House on the 30th day of January, 1837; and also the expenditure incurred under the orders of this House of the 15th and 18th September last, in relation to the printing of the rules and orders of the House, with Jefferson's Manual of Practice.

Mr. WISE said he should vote for this amendment, for the reason that the bare presentation of it showed the necessity of Mr. HOPKIN's resolution being adopted. He suggested another point of inquiry to Mr. DROMGOOLE, viz: how much public patronage had been distributed during the last two years, and how much of that public patronage had gone into the pockets of the editors of the official organ.

In reference to the alleged bargain between the Madisonian and Intelligencer offices, Mr. W. disavowed any privity, though he had no doubt the parties on the other side (the Globe) would have made a similar bargain, if such existed, if they could have done so.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private Secretary, A. Van Buren, esq. transmitting a large mass of documents and correspondence in relation to the delay in the sailing of the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. INGHAM moved to refer them to the Committee on Naval Affairs. He would not move their printing at present, for the documents were very voluminous, and the committee would report at an early day what ought to be printed.

Mr. NAYLOR moved the printing of the whole.

Mr. MASON of Ohio understood that a vast amount of the correspondence had been already printed.

Mr. INGHAM confirmed that statement, and added that a great number of the other documents had also been printed.

Mr. MALLORY assented to Mr. INGHAM'S motion.

Mr. NAYLOR modified his motion, by excepting what had been already printed.

Mr. WISE was at a loss to see the necessity of referring the subject to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the time had gone by when the information would be of service. It was locking the stable door after the horse was stolen.

The motion of Mr. NAYLOR to print was rejected.

Mr. WISE then moved to instruct the committee to inquire into and report the causes, of the failure of the Exploring Expedition.

Mr. INGHAM accepted this amendment; and, so modified, his motion to commit was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting certain custom-house returns.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the Postmaster General containing statements of the postages received on paid and unpaid letters sent by express mail, from and to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and Mobile.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of La. laid on the table.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.
